V. 9, 10. “The heart” here means the dispositions and desires of the rational soul; the result of the understanding, will, and affections, reciprocally influencing each other. “The heart,” not of this or that man, but of fallen men in general, is declared “to be deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked.” Every man is naturally disposed to dissimulation, self-flattery, and hypocrisy, in an inconceivable degree; every man is liable to be imposed upon by his own heart; and this deceitfulness is more dangerous to him, than any external artifice and deceit. The pride of the heart leads men to form false estimates of their own real and comparative character and conduct, and to think far better and more highly of themselves than they ought. (Note, Rom. xii. 3—5, v. 3.) The love of the pleasure and profit, resulting from the favourite sin, betrays every man into deception respecting its criminality, and his own guilt and danger: his understanding is thus bribed to frame excuses and palliations of it; he is led to call it by some soft name, and his conscience is thus seduced into connivance. The enmity of the heart to the holiness of God, and his righteous sovereignty, betrays men, in a variety of ways, into fallacious reasonings about his perfections, and their obligations to him; against the divine original of the sacred scripture, or against its obvious meaning; against the strict and spiritual precepts and awful sanctions of the law; against the humbling doctrines of the gospel or their holy tendency; and against the measure, rule, and consequences of the future judgment. To this deceitfulness of the heart, all partial and erroneous decisions of the conscience are, in a great measure, to be ascribed: with the self-preference, which is universal in all unconverted men; and alas, remains, and exerts its influence, though it does not reign, even in the converted. The irrational propensity of the most atrocious criminals to palliate their vices, and to value themselves on some imagined virtues, or exemptions from this or the other vice: and the gross absurdity of men’s boasting of the goodness of their hearts, when forced to allow the wickedness of their lives; though they must be conscious, that their wicked inclinations and imaginations have been, and are, immensely more numerous than their actual sins; spring from the same source.—Hence also originates the universal propensity of men to be confident in hasty resolutions of amendment, under sudden terrors or pangs of conscience, or when the near prospect of death affrights them; though they have found them as changeable as the wind, in all former instances. In a word, (for the detail would be endless,) the deceitfulness of the heart is the only cause, that any man doubts of its being “desperately wicked;” and capable of every kind or degree of impiety, iniquity, enmity, cruelty, or sensuality, which ever was committed, or can be conceived. For the history of the world and of the church, yea, universal experience and observation demonstrate, that the heart of every man is naturally so wicked, that, were he left wholly to himself, in suitable circumstances of temptation, and gradual seduction from one thing to another, by the artifice of Satan; he is capable of deliberately committing any crime, which ever was perpetrated on earth, and with every possible aggravation. But, like an artful villain, who conceals, that he may the more certainly perpetrate, his base purposes, the “heart is so deceitful in its desperate wickedness,” that it is wholly unsuspected by most men respecting themselves; even though they are aware of the artfulness and selfishness of other men, and suspicious of them to excess. But he, who believes the testimony of God, learns to watch his own heart, as he would a servant, who, he was credibly assured, was a concealed robber or thief: and he will in a course of years, and by a variety of painful experiences, comparing what passes in his mind with the divine law, and praying to be taught of God to know himself; (Notes, Ps. cxxxix. 1, 23, 24;) infallibly learn the truth of this harsh and offensive decision, in his own case: he will perceive that this is the exact picture of his own heart; and thence he will deduce many most important instructions to direct his conduct. But no man can penetrate to the depth of this desperate evil: the more the subject is studied, the worse the heart of man will appear: yet much must remain unknown, both in our own hearts and those of others, which could only be discovered by our being actually placed, in all the infinite variety of possible circumstances and temptations. As this cannot be done with any man, nor the result be made fully known to a finite understanding: so God alone, who knows entirely, and searches thoroughly, the heart of man, is perfectly acquainted with the extent of its desperate wickedness. (Notes, Heb. iv. 12, 13. Rev. ii. 20—23.) And he proves and tries men’s actions, to bring forth into practice what he sees in the heart, whether of the sin which is naturally there, or of the grace which he has communicated; that his decisions may appear to his creatures, (what they uniformly are in themselves,) the result of infinite justice, wisdom, truth, and mercy.—The Lord saw the hearts of the Jews to be more desperately rebellious than their conduct shewed them; and this might be assigned as a reason of his severe judgments: it is also a conclusive reason, that none should trust in men, but in God alone. (Note, 5—8.)—“It is even past all hope: who can know it?” Blayney.—It is incurably sick. It is so desperately diseased, that ‘there is no health in it.’ (Note, Is. i. 5, 6.)

(Notes, 15—18. xxxi. 18—20.) He prayed also that he would save him from his enemies, and from the destruction of the wicked. He had hitherto worshipped and praised the name of the Lord; he had gloried in him, and given him the glory of all his former mercies; and he

V. 15—18. It greatly discomposed the prophet, that the people continued to treat his predictions with contempt and derision: they did not, and would not, believe them to be the word of God, till they were fulfilled, of which they saw no probability; and thus they even set the Almighty

at defiance. (Notes, v. 10—14. Is. v. 18, 19. Ez. xii. 21 —28, Am. v. 18—20. 2 Pet. iii. 1—4.) But the prophet could appeal to God, that he had not been eager to leave the ordinary employment of a priest, or pastor of the flock, to follow him as a prophet: he had neither sought this honour for himself, nor been hasty in accepting of it.

(Note, i. 6—8.) Or, as others interpret it, he had patiently continued in the execution of his office, as became a publick teacher who was a follower of God; and had not been wearied out by ill usage. The Lord could witness for him, that he had not desired the woeful season which he predicted; but had continually pleaded for a reversal or mitigation of the sentence. (Notes, vii. 16. xiii. 15—17. xiv.

7—16. xv. 1. xviii. 19, 20.) He had faithfully adhered to the instructions given him; and had spoken what was right in the sight of God, and what the Lord would verify: he therefore prayed, that he would not be a terror to him, seeing he was his only confidence in the day of evil. (xvi.

19.)—In the present confusion of his mind, Jeremiah seems to have had alarming apprehensions of the divine displeasure, or of being involved in the public calamities.

But he prayed that he might be exempted from confusion and dismay, and that these might be the portion of his persecutors; and that the day of evil might overwhelm them with double destruction, as they had occasioned the ruin of the nation. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xii. 1—4. xiv general understand the first clause to mean, that the bird in question sat on eggs which she had not laid, or those of a different species, and that the young left her when hatched; so that she had the confinement and fatigue of sitting on the eggs, but no compensating pleasure from

trivance, and many crimes; and then they are taken away by Providence, perhaps in the prime of their lives: (Note, Ps. lv. 23:) so that they are torn from their riches, having had little or no satisfaction in them; and their end proves their folly, though for a time they were deemed prudent

the case of many Jews at the time of the captivity. (Marg.

V. 12, 13. The sanctuary of God was placed among the Jews, for a throne on which JEHOVAH was gloriously exalted, as their King and Protector; whence he displayed his power and majesty, in the works of mercy and special avow, which he from age to age wrought for them. But they were taught to consider this, as merely the footstool

(Notes, vii. 8—11. Is. lvii. 15, 16. lxvi. 1, 2.) Thus he was "the Hope of Israel;" and they needed not to seek for any other helper. This aggravated the guilt of those who forsook the Lord, to follow idols, and to trust an arm of flesh, which was sure to end in confusion and disgrace.

—As Jeremiah was "the mouth of God," those who departed from him, forsook God also: and they would be rebased and trampled on, as if their names were written in the dust to be soon erased; their memory would be blotted out, or rendered infamous; and they would have no portion on earth, and have no name in heaven.

promises contained in it, which they think less suitable to the time when the captivity was absolutely decided on. But this is uncertain: for the Lord proved the people by one test after another, that their obstinate rebellion might be more evident: and he might properly make these conditional promises, though he foreknew that they would not perform the annexed condition. 'From hence it appears, that the judgments denounced against Jerusalem, at least as far as they threatened the city with utter destruction, were not irreversible. ... 'Tis true, that in several other chapters of this prophecy, God, upon foresight of the 'Jews' impenitence, pronounces a peremptory sentence 'upon them.' Lowth. It is therefore probable, that the message was sent at a later period.—The prophet was directed to lay before the king, rulers, and people of Judah, this command and its sanctions, in the most publick manner. (Notes, vii. 1, 2. xxvi. 2. Prov. i. 20—23.) Let them shew their disposition to return to obedience in general, by observing strictly and by enforcing the fourth commandment, and not doing any manner of work, or permitting it to be done, neither transacting any business on the sabbath-day. (Notes, Ex. xvi. 22—30. xx. 8—11. xxxi. 13—17. Ez. xx. 12, 21, 22.) Let them prevent any burden being carried by man or beast, and cause all secular employments to cease, according to the law given to their fathers, but obstinately broken by them. (Notes, Neh. x. 30, 31, v. 31. xiii. 15—22. John v. 10—14.) Let them take heed to themselves, and to "their souls," (for they were now especially put on their good behaviour:) and if they diligently obeyed this word, their prosperity should be restored and established; the family of David should recover its pristine dignity; Jerusalem should never be subdued by any invader; and the temple should be preserved, and frequented by the people, living in plenty, peace, and security, as in the best days of their pious kings. (Marg. Re. h—o.) But if they refused obedience in this particular, the predicted vengeance would be inevitable. (Note, Lam. iv. 11.)—We cannot possibly conceive any thing more decisive, on the importance of hallowing the sabbath-day. (Notes, Is. lviii. 13, 14. Matt. xii. 3—12.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

Men in general violate the commands of God, without much reflection, either at the time or afterwards: yet even sin is marked in his book, as with an iron pen; yea, they are all so graven upon the table of the heart, that they will be readily recognized by every man's conscience in the great day of retribution. (Note, Rev. xx. 11—15.) Indeed conscience frequently now reproaches the transgressor with some of his most atrocious crimes; though instead of yielding to conviction, he, as much as possible, imposes silence on that friendly monitor, and rushes into further sins. This is the effect of our natural and customary bias to evil, whence impiety and wickedness proceed, like water from a fountain.—That which is "graven in the heart" will become legible in the life: men's actions are only specimens of their desires and purposes; and as such they testify against sinners, and prove the justice of God in the punishments inflicted on them.—Children are prone to folget good instructions, examples, and tuition: but they readily remember the vanity, vice, and folly, in which they have been trained up, or with which their memories and imaginations have been early polluted. Thus one generation succeeds to the crimes of another: and the tendency of corrupt nature is from bad to worse; except, as a prudent, cautious, and pious education of youth, and proper means used by parents, ministers, magistrates, and others, are rendered effectual by the blessing of God, to counteract the tendency. This consideration may suggest many important duties to men in every order of society, for their own good, and that of their neighbours, and the rising generation.—Whatever we suffer, or however we may be impoverished, or enslaved by cruel enemies in a strange land; yet we shall be happy if we escape “the fire of the LORD’s anger, which will burn for ever.”—No good, but every evil, will be awarded to those who “trust in man,” and expect happiness from their fellow-creatures, or salvation from themselves: for thus they remain impenitent and unbelieving, shut up under the curse of the law, and must be left for ever base and unholy, to associate with the enemies of God, in the regions of shame, misery, despair, and absolute, unrestrained wickedness. But every blessing, in time and to eternity, shall surely be conferred on all who trust in the Lord: they shall both be blessed, and blessings. (Note, Ps. lxxxiv. 11, 12.)

V. 9—13.

“The heart is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked:” (Note, Matt. xv. 15—20:) our doings must, of course, be evil; as far as we are left to ourselves, without the grace of the Holy Spirit, and exposed to the temptations of the devil, and of wicked men.—The conviction of this deceitfulness and desperate wickedness of the human heart should remind us, that “he, who trusteth in his own heart, is a fool.” (Note, Prov. xxviii. 26.) What need then have we of deep humiliation before God! How entirely should we depend on his mercy and grace! How ought we to examine ourselves, to keep out of the way of temptation, to shun every occasion of sin, and to pray to be rendered victorious over every assault of the tempter! What cause have we to beg of God, continually to search, and prove, and keep us, and not suffer us to be deceived by our own hearts; (Note, Ps. cxxxix. 23.) How ought we to create in us a clean and holy nature by his Spirit! How jealous should we be of ourselves, distrustful of our own resolves, and suspicious of our judgment in our own cause, or where our prejudices or interests are concerned! How thankful should we be for restraints, (even by poverty, pain, or sickness,) from acting out all that is in our hearts, to the misery and ruin, temporal and eternal, of ourselves and others! How thankful especially should we be for the salvation of Christ! And how patient under every trial which we meet with from the hand of God, or from the wickedness of our fellow sinners! For nothing but the divine interposition could make our lives tolerable in such a world as this; as it too plainly appears from the wars, persecutions, massacres, cruel oppressions, and other dreadful crimes and evils, which have in all ages and countries hitherto desolated the earth: insomuch that every historian, who relates unvarnished facts, as effectually illustrates the scriptural doctrine of man’s depravity, as if he had purposely set himself to do it!—What will it avail men, if by their crimes they have accumulated wealth, and lived in prosperity; when God shall cut them off, and say unto each of them, “Thou fool, this night shall thy soul be required of thee, and then whose shall those things be, which thou hast provided?” Hypocrisy can serve no other purpose but that of self-deception, or imposing on our fellow creatures: “for the LORD knows, and searches the heart and reins, to give every man according to his ways.” Let us then seek happiness by trusting in him, accepting of his mercy, and walking before him in the humble obedience of love, and the patient submission of hope: that, being planted in his courts, we may grow fruitful in righteousness, and flourish in unfading and ever increasing prosperity. For no changes or temptations can injure the root, wither the leaf, destroy the fruit, or even mar the beauty of those “trees of righteousness,” which the Lord hath planted for the glory of his name. May we then rejoice in the Hope of Israel; may our names be written in heaven, and our treasure there deposited!

V. 14—27.

Whatever wounds or diseases we experience in our hearts or consciences, let us apply to our God and Saviour to “heal us, that we may be healed; to save us, that we may be saved,” and that our souls may praise his name. His hands can bind up the troubled conscience, and heal the broken heart; (Notes, Job v. 18, 19. Hos. vi. 1—3;) he can cure the most inveterate diseases of our infected nature: he can fill us with joy amidst contempt or persecution, and even in the agonies of death; and his righteousness and salvation are for ever. Thus, applying to him for all the blessings of his grace, “exercising ourselves to have a conscience void of offence towards God and man,” and, following him patiently and fully, all things will certainly terminate in our good.—Trials all must meet with: and the ministers of Christ cannot escape the enmity and scorn of those, who despise and defy God himself: but if they have not rashly intruded into the sacred office; if they are now employed by him, and keep close to their instructions; if they continue to pray for the salvation of those, whom they solemnly “warn to flee from the wrath to come;” if their words and works are right before God; they have nothing to fear: he will not be a terror but a comfort to them, and answer their hopes in every day of evil: and whilst they are delivered and graciously rewarded, their enemies will be dismayed and destroyed with aggravated ruin.—The daring impiety of mankind appears exceedingly in the contempt which is generally shewn to the commandment of hallowing the sabbath. The de-

^b 3 Then ^c I went down to the potter's house, and, behold, he wrought a work on the ^{*} wheels.

[†] 4 And the vessel that he [†] made of clay was marred in the hand of the potter; so he [†] made it again another vessel, ^d as seemed good to the potter to make it.

5 Then the word of the LORD came to me, saying,

^e 6 O house of Israel, ^e cannot I do with you as this potter? saith the LORD. Behold, as the clay is in the potter's hand, so are ye in mine hand, O house of Israel.

8 If ^g that nation, against whom I have pronounced, turn from their evil, ^h I will repent of the evil that I thought to do unto them.

9 And at what instant I shall speak concerning a nation, and concerning a kingdom, ⁱ to build and to plant it;

gree of strictness with which this ordinance is observed, or the contrary, is a good test of the degree of spiritual religion in any land. But by this rule, how awful is our condition in this nation, especially in the metropolis and its environs! A very small number in proportion, in most parts of the land, pay any decent respect to the Lord's day, or the ends for which it was instituted. Various secular employments, and some not fit to be tolerated on any day, are openly conducted on it: and, probably, more gross licentiousness and impiety are perpetrated on that, than on all the other days of the week. If this have a similar connexion with our national peace and prosperity, as it had with those of Judah: we have abundant reason to take heed to ourselves, and to fear lest a fire should be kindled in our gates to devour our most magnificent palaces; in too many of which God's holy day is more daringly violated, than in almost any of the houses of the poor, or in their resorts of intemperance and revelry. Doubtless he may say in this land also, "I commanded, but they obeyed not, neither inclined their ear; but made their neck stiff, that they might not hear, nor receive instruction." It behoves the ministers of religion in every place to sound the alarm in this respect, that all who go in and out at our gates may hear: and that rulers, magistrates, and all the inhabitants of the land, by their authority, influence, and example; by attention to their families, and by avoiding all intercourse with those who will not hallow the Lord's day, may combine to check the progress of this growing evil: that so, true religion may revive, general reformation may take place, our national prosperity be preserved and increased; and above all, that the souls of men may be led into the ways of eternal salvation.

NOTES.

CHAP. XVIII. V. 1—6. Notes, xix. 2. Is. xlv. 9, 10.—Wheels. (3) Literally, "two stones;" one beneath fixed, and one above which turned round; and answering the purpose of modern contrivances for the same purpose. (Marg.)

—Indisputably the Lord had a far more absolute property in his people, as their Creator and Governor, than the potter could have over the clay: yet the potter disposed of his clay as he pleased without controul; but the people were ever ready to murmur against God, for his dispensations towards them. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Rom. ix. 19—21.)

V. 7—10. The sovereignty of God is absolute, and he does not always make known to us the wise, and righteous, and holy reasons of his conduct; especially towards fallen sinners, who are as "marred clay in his hand." This was here shewn to be the case, in his providential government of the nations. If he sent his prophets to threaten any nation with desolating judgments for their sins; a reserve of mercy to the penitent was always implied. If then that nation took the alarm, and by repentance and reformation sought to avert the impending storm, the Lord would certainly "repent of the evil which he thought to do to them;" that is, he would not execute the threatened vengeance. Thus Nineveh repented at the preaching of Jonah, and escaped the predicted judgment. (Notes, Jon. iii.) On the other hand, all promises of national prosperity implied a requirement of obedience: and if a general apostasy from God and his service took place, the promised blessings would be revoked or withheld. "Whenever repentance is ascribed to God, it must be meant only of a change, with respect to the outward administrations of his providence, and his dealing with men otherwise than he did before." Lowth. "When the scripture attributeth repentance unto God, it is not, that he doeth contrary to that which he hath ordained in his secret counsel. But when he threateneth, it is a calling to repentance: and when he giveth man grace to repent, the threatening (which ever containeth a condition in it,) taketh no place; and this the scripture calleth repentance in God; because it so appeareth to man's judgment."—(Note, Gen. vi. 6, 7 Num. xxiii. 19, 20.) Wherever either a threatening or promise is confirmed by an oath; the Lord is never said to repent. (Notes, Num. xiv. 27—30. Ps. xcv. 9—11. ex. Heb. vi. 16—20, vv. 16—18. vii. 26—28.)

11 ¶ Now therefore ¹go to, speak to the men of Judah, and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, saying, Thus saith the LORD, Behold, I frame evil against you, ^mand devise a device against you: ⁿreturn ye now every one from his evil way, and make your ways and your doings good.

12 And they said ^oThere is no hope; but ^pwe will walk after our own devices, and we will every one do the imagination of his evil heart.

13 Therefore thus saith the LORD; Ask ye now among the heathen, ^rwho hath heard such things: ^sthe virgin of Israel hath done ^ta very horrible thing.

14 Will a man leave ^uthe snow of Lebanon which cometh from the rock of the field? or shall the cold flowing waters that come from another place be forsaken?

15 Because ^vmy people hath forgotten me, they have ^wburnt incense to vanity, and they have ^xcaused them to stumble in their ways from ^ythe ancient paths, ^zto walk in paths, in a way not cast up;

16 To ^bmake their land desolate, and ^ca perpetual hissing: every one that passeth thereby shall be astonished, ^dand wag his head.

17 I will ^escatter them as with an east wind before the enemy; I will ^fshew them the back, and not the face, in ^gthe day of their calamity.

18 ¶ Then said they, ^hCome, and let us devise devices against Jeremiah: ⁱfor the law shall not perish from the priest, nor ^kcounsel from the wise, nor the word from the prophet. ^lCome, and let us smite him ^mwith the tongue, and let us not give heed to any of his words.

V. 11, 12. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, vii. 5—7. xvii. 19—27.) The people either pleaded that God was a severe Master, whom there was no hope of pleasing; and an implacable Enemy, whom there was no hope of pacifying: or, that there was no hope of security or prosperity, if they renounced their idols and heathen ordinances, and returned to his service: they were therefore determined to go on in their evil ways. (Notes, ii. 25. xlv. 15—25. Is. lvii. 9, 10.)—“But they said desperately, Surely we will walk after our own imaginations; and do every man after the stubbornness of his wicked heart.” Old Version.—“As men that had no remorse, but were altogether bent to rebellion, and to their own self-will.”—Perhaps the people contemptuously and profanely used the prophet’s own words concerning them, in expressing their avowed disregard to his exhortations: for it is not likely, that they meant to own the wickedness of their hearts. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Is. xxviii. 9—11. 14, 15.)—There is no hope. (12) ^{וְנִיחַ}, from ^{נָחַ}. Note, xvii. 9, 10, v. 9.

V. 13—17. (Notes, ii. 10—13.) The heathen had not apostatized from their false gods, as the Israelites did from the true God. He had espoused the nation as a chaste virgin: but she had committed most horrible adulteries. (Notes, Ez. xvi. 9—22.) Common sense taught men to value clear waters, which, from the melted snows on Lebanon, were purified by running through the cavities of the rocks, and sprang up in the fields: or to prefer the cold spring waters from any other place, to the stagnant waters of some pond or cistern; or to waters brought from afar by aqueducts. (Note, 2 Kings xix. 24.) But Israel had forsaken the infinitely glorious JEHOVAH for worthless idols; and they had caused each other to stumble and turn aside from the ancient paths, in which their believing ancestors had walked, into such as were unauthorized: (Note, vi. 16, 17 :) and which resembled the deep or rough road, through countries which are seldom travelled. For this sin and folly their land would soon be desolated, and exposed to the derision of every passenger; (Marg. Ref. b—d.—Note, Lam. ii. 15, 16;) they would be left to flee before the enemy, as chaff or dust before the east-wind; and the Lord would turn his back on them, and shew them no favour in their distress.—The fourteenth verse is rendered differently by some translators; but the general meaning is clear; and our translation seems preferable to such as are substituted in its place. (Marg.)

V. 18. When the prophet assured the people, that the Lord “devised a device against them” (11), and when he called them to repentance; instead of obeying the call, they “devised devices against him,” and thus they shewed their enmity against God. The prophet had denounced vengeance against the ungodly priests, rulers, and counsellors, and the false prophets. (Marg. Ref. i, k.) But the people were confident, that these would maintain their credit and authority, notwithstanding his predictions; and that their priests would be able to understand and handle the law, their wise men to give good counsel, and their prophets to speak the word of God to them. (Notes, v. 30, 31. viii. 8, 9. Deut. xvii. 8—13.) They therefore consulted together to calumniate him, and to obtain false witness against him, that he might be condemned: or, to punish him for the words, which he had spoken: for they determined not to give heed to any of them. (Notes, xxvi. 7—9. Am. vii. 10, 11. Acts vi. 9—14.)—The chief priests and scribes had just the same objection to the doctrine of Christ and his apostles, and conducted their opposition exactly in the same manner. (Marg. Ref. l, m.—Notes, Matt. xxiii. 13—39. xxvi. 57—62. John vii. 3—10, v. 7. xv. 17—25.)—“This argument the wicked have ever used against the servants of God.—The church cannot err: we are the church, and therefore whosoever speaketh

20 Shall ^c evil be recompensed for good? for they have ^d digged a pit for my soul. ^e Remember that I stood before thee to speak good for them, and to turn away thy wrath from them.

21 Therefore ^f deliver up their children to the famine, and ^g pour out their blood by the force of the sword; ^h and let their wives be bereaved of their children, and be widows; and let their men be put to death; ⁱ let their young men be slain by the sword in battle.

22 Let ^j a cry be heard from their houses, when thou shalt bring a troop suddenly upon them; ^k for they have digged a pit to take me, ^l and hid snares for my feet.

^q against us, they ought to die. ... Thus the false church ^r persecuteth the true church, which standeth not in outward pomp, and in multitude; but is known by the ^s graces of the Holy Ghost.

V. 19, 20. The discovery of this conspiracy led the prophet to renew his complaints; and his prayers, that the Lord would notice the malicious words of those, who rewarded him evil for good. If the people would not attend to his words, he trusted the Lord would, and prayed that he would.—They were secretly plotting against his life: but God who searched the heart, knew that he had earnestly prayed for their temporal and eternal salvation. (Notes, vii. 16. xi. 18—23. xv. 1. 15—18.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS

V. 1—10

The servant of God may collect profitable hints from every object and occurrence: and nothing conveys truth more forcibly than apt illustration.—We should unreservedly obey the commandments of God: and if we would ^{ac} hear his words, we must use the appointed means, and observe his directions.—The great Creator and Lord of the universe has an undoubted right and uncontrollable power, to dispose of us and of all creatures, as he pleases: this extends equally to other nations as to Israel; and likewise to individuals; to our temporal and our eternal concerns: and as fallen creatures, we are entirely without plea or claim, having forfeited every thing by sin. The Lord may therefore, ^{ad} according to the counsel of his own will, either leave us to ourselves, as “vessels of wrath fitted for destruction;” or cast us into a new shape, “as vessels of mercy prepared before for his eternal glory.” (Note, Rom. ix. 22, 23.) But this absolute sovereignty is always directed by unerring wisdom, and exercised with the most perfect justice, truth, goodness, and mercy: so that none have ought to fear from it, but the determined enemies of God; and none can object to it, without finding fault with infinite perfection. What then can rational creatures deem preferable to this absolute dominion? what can a penitent sinner desire more, than the uncontrollable rule of infinite mercy? (Notes, Ex. xxxiii. 18, 19. xxxiv. 5—7. Rom. ix. 15—18.) And who will say, that encouragement should be held forth to the impenitent, as such? What need then of limitations, when error and iniquity are impossible? Let us therefore ^{ae} rejoice that the LORD reigneth, and ^{af} that ^{ag} his counsel shall stand, and he will do all his pleasure: ^{ah} let us leave secret things to him unto whom they appertain, and study to profit by what he has been pleased to reveal. For it is as certain concerning individuals, as nations, that no threatening, pronounced against the workers of iniquity, will exclude those from mercy, who repent and turn from their evil ways, and flee for refuge to the hope of the gospel: and that no promises belong to those who turn aside from their profession, to do evil in the sight of God, and go on in disobeying his word: but we may rejoice at the assurance that he will ^{ai} put his fear into the heart of true believers, ^{aj} that they should not thus depart from him. (Notes, xxxii. 39—41. Ez. xviii. 21—27. Heb. vi. 4—6.)

V. 11—23.

Sinners should be called on to take notice, that the Lord is ^{ak} framing evil, and devising devices, concerning them; ^{al} which they cannot escape, except they return from their evil ways, and seek his grace, that they may ^{am} make their ^{an} ways and doings good. But some answer, ^{ao} There is no fear, God is so merciful, that he will not punish; others say, ^{ap} There is no hope, ^{aq} for he is so strict and severe, that he cannot be pleased, and will not pardon: while some verge alternately to presumption, and despair; and in both extremes determine to ^{ar} follow ^{as} their own devices, and to walk after the imaginations ^{at} and obstinacy of their own evil hearts.—The perversion or contempt of God's word, and the daring disregard shewn to his precepts, among professing Christians, are

The prophet is sent to Tophet, with an earthen bottle, and attended by the elders; to denounce the judgments of God on the Jews and on Jerusalem, and there to break the bottle as an emblem of their destruction, 1—13. He returns to the temple, and declares the same to the people, 14, 15.

more horrible than any wickedness to be found among the heathen. Multitudes forget God to follow lying vanities, and “stumble from the ancient paths” to walk in ways of their own devising. But he will disown those who have disowned him: and what will they then do in “the day of judgment, and perdition of ungodly men?”—Instead of taking warning by the awful denunciations of scripture, men frame devices against the faithful servants of God, who “declare to them his whole counsel:” and none are so violent and implacable in their enmity as false teachers, who are proud of their learning, rank, wisdom, and reputation for sanctity: for the faithful preaching of God’s word detects their hypocrisy and ignorance, undermines their credit and authority, and predicts their confusion and destruction.—When sinners resolve not to regard the word of God, it may be expected, that base slanders of his servants will form a prelude to more bloody persecutions: except their malice should be restrained either by an invisible power, or by the salutary laws of the country in which they reside. In such circumstances we should study to “possess our souls with patience,” and to give ourselves unto prayer: and it will be comfortable to reflect that we have earnestly sought, and fervently prayed for, the salvation of those, who now revile or persecute us: but we must still continue to pray for, and not against them. We may, however, declare that most tremendous punishments await such, as “recompense evil for good,” and seek to destroy faithful ministers, or to entangle them in their snares; unless they repent of this atrocious wickedness. Nor can men commit any sin, which has a more direct tendency to bring down national judgments; and to entail misery on their posterity, as well as destruction on their own souls.

But the blood of innocents, or of innocent persons, (as contrasted with malefactors who were put to death for their crimes,) includes the blood of the prophets, and of the righteous, who were put to death by the persecuting rage of the rulers and people: and of those also, who were put to death, like Naboth, by oppressive rulers, by means of iniquitous statutes, unjust decrees, and the testimony of suborned false witnesses. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Man's unteachableness and unbelief render it proper to use a variety of methods to engage his attention; repetitions become unavoidable; and sometimes a mere circumstance may impress those, who remained unaffected under the most solemn warnings of the word of God. We ought therefore to avail ourselves of every proper expedient, and to observe every direction for that purpose.—Those who stop their ears, and harden their hearts, against the threatenings of God, will not only have their ears made to tingle at the report of dire calamities; but their hearts filled with anguish and dismay, at feeling the truth of what they would not believe.—The rulers, in church and state, are peculiarly concerned to know those things, which relate to national sins and judgments: and it is highly proper and important to convey information and warning to the more careless, by means of such as are willing to attend to the word of God.—Men may often read their sins in their punishment: persecutors and oppressors commonly come to a dreadful and violent end; abused plenty often terminates in wretched penury: and children trained up in ungodliness become the misery of their offending parents. They who despise God, must sink into contempt and ruin: and he will “make void the counsels” of all those who will not obey his commandments.—The power of the mightiest nations is as easily broken by him as an earthen vessel; and he often destroys them so entirely, that none can make them whole: but he is chiefly to be feared, as “able to destroy both body and soul in hell.” That is a ruin which will never be repaired: but all other afflictions, personal or publick, will “work together for good” to those, whom “Jesus delivereth from the wrath to come.”

NOTES.

CHAP. XX. V. 1—6. It might have been expected, that the prophet's faithfulness in delivering these most tremendous predictions, in so publick a manner, would exasperate the rulers of Judah, if it did not convince and humble them. Accordingly we have in this chapter an account of a persecution which he endured, and of his behaviour under it. Pashur, a priest of the race or order of Immer, (1 Chr. xxiv. 14. Note, Ezra ii. 36—39,) who under the high priest superintended the affairs of the temple; (Notes, 2 Kings xi. 4. Acts iv. 1—3;) having heard of the predictions which the prophet had delivered in the temple; and perhaps being present when he repeated them in the temple, used his authority to punish and silence him, as a troubler of the nation. Having smitten or scourged him as a malefactor, he set him in the stocks, in a publick part of the city, (Marg. Ref. d.) and left him there all night, exposed to ignominy as well as pain. This he probably thought would disgrace him with the people, and discourage him from prophesying any more. The prophet seems to have borne the indignity with silence and patience: but when the next day Pashur came to set him at liberty, he was directed to inform him that God had named him "Magor-missabib," or "Terror round about:" (Marg. and Marg. Ref.) for he would cause him to be alarmed continually, through terrors of conscience and surrounding dangers: he should be so disquieted as to become a terror to himself and to his friends; and, having seen several of them slain in the siege of Jerusalem, he and the rest should be carried captive to Babylon: there they should be slain before his eyes; and he should die and be buried there, with all those whom he had deluded by his lies; for he was a false prophet, as well as a persecuting priest. (Notes, xxviii. 15—17.)—Probably, these predictions made such an impression on Pashur's mind, as to disturb his imagination during all the succeeding events, and to produce the predicted terror.

Stocks. (2, 3.) מַחְבֵּטֵי הַחֵטָא, (from חָטָא:) eversio, subversio; item cippus, ab evertendo et contorquendo corpore. Robertson. It occurs, as signifying an overthrow, Deut. xxix. 22. Is. i. 7. x. 19, and elsewhere. Some learned men understand this word merely as signifying a place of confinement, or "house of correction:" but the word is never used for any of the prisons into which the prophet was afterwards cast: and the punishment seems to have been publick and ignominious. (Notes, xxix. 24—32, v. 26. 2 Chr. xvi. 7—12. Acts xvi. 19—24.)

duced him by his promises, to undertake the prophetic office; and thus he was drawn in to engage: (Notes, i. 6—8. 17—19. xv. 15—21 :) and now he found himself disappointed of the comfort and credit which he had expected. God, however, had expressly told him, that the rulers and people of the land would "fight against him, though they "should not prevail against him:" so that he had no ground to say that the Lord had deceived him.—He complained also, that the Lord being stronger than he, constrained him by an influence, which he could not withstand, to continue in his work, though he met with daily derision and insult. From the beginning of his ministry, he had been urged with great vehemence, to reprove the oppression and iniquity of the people, and to predict that they would be given up to the violence and rapacity of their enemies. On this account the word of the Lord became the cause of continual reproach and derision to him: whereas had he spoken more agreeable things, he might have met with respect and favour; which he seems improperly to have expected. He had therefore determined to speak no more to the people, concerning God, or in his name: but the convictions of his conscience, zeal for the glory of God, indignation at the sins, and compassion for the souls of the people; and, above all, the immediate impulse of the prophetic Spirit, so urged him on, that he had no more ease, than if "a "burning fire had been shut up in his bones:" so that he was wearied out with forbearing, and could no longer refrain from delivering his message, though it exposed him to further trials. (Notes, vi. 10—12. Job xxxii. 18—22. Ps. xxxix. 1—4, v. 3. Ez. iii. 1—3. 12—15. 1 Cor. ix. 13—18, vv. 16—18. 2 Cor. v. 13—15.)—'Herein appeareth the impatiency, which oftentimes overcometh the servants of God, 'when they see not their labours to profit, and also feel their 'own weakness. ...Thou didst thrust me forth to this work 'against my will. ...He thought to have ceased to preach; 'save that God's Spirit did force him thereunto.'—The word rendered "deceived," may be translated attracted, or allured. (Note, 1 Kings xxii. 19—23, v. 20.)—'The 'power of divine grace attracts souls to God. ...Jeremiah 'alludes to the power of that call, by which he was at- 'tracted and drawn to the work of the ministry, which he 'exercised among many difficulties and contradictions.'—The same verb is rendered enticed in the tenth verse; persuade, 1 Kings xxii. 20. 22; and entice, 2 Chr. xviii. 19, 20.—In another form the same verb is used, Gen. ix. 27: and rendered in the margin, persuade.—Generally, however, it implies some kind or degree of deception; but this arises, as in the case of Ahab, from the heart of the person himself. (Note, 2 Thes. ii. 8—12.)

Since I spake, &c. (8) "For as often as I speak, whether I cry out against injustice, or proclaim devastation; "the word of JEHOVAH is turned against me, into matter "of reproach and derision continually." Blayney.

V. 10—13. The prophet thought that he had abundant reason to be weary of his work, when he heard every where those who reviled and terrified him; so that he became like Pashur, a terror to himself, for "fear was on "every side" of him. (Note, Ps. xxxi. 10—13.) His enemies encouraged each other to collect or invent calumnies against him, and engaged to circulate them. His most intimate acquaintance narrowly watched him, expecting to see him make some false step, which might afford them an advantage: nay, they endeavoured to entice him into some improper conduct, that they might prevail against him, and be revenged on him for his reproofs, and the terror of conscience which he had occasioned them. "Recollect in 'what manner our Saviour was continually beset with per- 'sons, who often put the like treacherous arts in practice, 'with a view to entrap and entangle him, so as to furnish 'a specious accusation against him.' Blayney.—While thus stating his case, his faith sprang into lively exercise; he felt himself assured of the divine favour; he perceived that God was his mighty Defender, and a terrible Avenger of his enemies; he confidently predicted their confusion and ruin; he recollected that the Lord tried, that he might purify, the righteous; he had opened his cause to him, as his heart-searching Judge, and the Avenger of his enemies; and he exulted and praised God, and called on others to praise him, in the assurance of deliverance and victory. (Notes, xi. 18—23. Ps. xi. 4, 5. cix. 28—31.) 'Here he sheweth how his faith did strive against tempta- 'tion, and sought to the Lord for strength.' (Marg. Ref.)

V. 14—18. (Notes, Job iii.) This is the most extraordinary transition in the whole scriptures: and, for ought that appears to the contrary, the prophet related what passed in his experience, according to the order in which it took place. An experimental acquaintance with our own hearts, and the variations of our passions under sharp trials, as encouraging or discouraging thoughts occur to our minds, will best enable us to understand it. We should not think it possible for such rebellion and absurdity to prevail in the heart of a true believer, and to succeed the most vigorous exercises of faith, hope, and love ; did we not meet with a few instances of the kind in the word of God : and they, who have been thus tempted by Satan, might be further urged to adopt the most desperate conclusions and measures. Yet such thoughts and passionate wishes cannot be excused or palliated ; for they are strong proofs of the “desperate wickedness” of the heart. (Notes, xvii. 9, 10.) How absurd was it for a pious man to curse the day of his birth, which no longer had any existence, and was in no degree the cause of his sufferings ! to curse the man who first informed his father of his birth ; and even to wish him the doom of Sodom, or that the cry of terror and alarm might never cease to sound in his ears ; because he would not murder him when a helpless infant !—How strange to wish such an exquisitely cruel wish to his mother ! and all this, because he was called to endure contempt and persecution for a short time, which would be counterbalanced by divine consolations, and terminate in everlasting felicity. So unreasonable are passion and impatience !—‘How the children of God are overcome, in this battle of the flesh and the spirit ! And into what inconveniences they fall, till God raises them up again !’—Some expositors endeavour to palliate the vehement expressions here used, and explain them as merely poetical decorations of the prophet’s complaints : (Notes, 2 Sam. i. 19—27, v. 21 :) but surely no poetical licence can justify a man in using the language of impatience and ingratitude, and imprecating evils on those who never offended him. This may pass in profane writers, but not in inspired poets. But could these persons effect their purpose, they would also counteract the very design of the Holy Spirit, in recording such things ; viz. to shew what the best of men are when left to themselves ; and to preserve tempted believers from desponding, when they are harassed in like manner. (Notes, 1 Kings xix. 1—4. Ps. lxxiii. 12—17. Jon. i. 2, 3. iv. 1—11.) We ought not indeed to aggravate the faults of the servants of God ; but neither should we palliate them. We should rather imitate the impartiality of the sacred writers. The scriptures ascribe sinless perfection to one character only : all others were ready to confess, that in many things they offended ; and no good can arise from vainly attempting to vindicate them. (Notes, Gen. xii. 11—16. xxvii. 6—14. Acts xxiii. 1—5. Gal. ii. 11—16.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS

V. 1—6.

In this evil world, of which Satan is the god and prince, they, who boldly stand up for the authority, truth, and righteousness of JEHOVAH, will certainly meet with persecution in one form or another : and the more plain and convincing the truth is made to the minds and consciences of sinners, the more violent will be their resentment ; except the Lord powerfully restrain them, or change their hearts.—Superior rank, affluence, reputation, and authority render men more apt to take umbrage at the humbling truths, and sharp reproofs, and awful denunciations of God’s word : and thus, they who are exalted to do justice, preserve peace, and maintain truth, often take the lead in opposing the cause of God, and in persecuting his servants.—The worthless caterers to men’s vain pleasures, and the flatterers of their pride and passions, may expect favour, affluence, and distinction : but contempt and penury, dungeons, stripes, and the stocks, or more severe and bloody sufferings, have been the general recompence of those, who have sought the salvation of souls. (Notes, Matt. v. 10—12. Luke vi. 24—26.) But the Lord can easily make those a terror to themselves and to each other, who attempt to terrify his ministers from declaring faithfully the word of God, or to put them to silence and disgrace : no mitigation of the sentence can possibly be attained, by persecuting those who proclaim it : (Notes, xxxvi. 20—32 :) and lying prophets, and those who trust in them, will miserably perish together.

V. 7—13.

No opposition or ill treatment should deter “the man of God” from declaring his whole message : and indeed many have maintained their boldness and faithfulness, in their publick services, under the most perilous circumstances ; who yet have been grievously baffled by Satan’s temptations in their private experience, and led to wish they had never engaged in this work, or could change their employment for some other. But those who “put their hands to the plow, and look back, are not fit for the kingdom of God :” and after all, the minister’s work is in reality the most important, honourable, and useful service, which man can possibly perform. They, however, who are thus employed, deceive themselves, if they expect worldly honour and the friendship of men, from a faithful discharge of their office ; nay, if they do not expect contempt, opposition, and injurious treatment from ungodly men of every description. The Lord does indeed allure men into the service, by giving them a hope of usefulness, and assurance of assistance and support : and few are at first aware, of the extent and variety of those trials and difficulties, to which they will be exposed in the course of their ministry. So that, when contempt, derision, or hard usage tempt them to resolve that “they will speak no more in his name,” or that they will qualify their message, and render it more palatable, the Lord, being stronger than they, prevails, and they find “his “word like a burning fire shut up in their bones,” and that no relief from their disquietude can be had, but by faithfully “declaring the whole counsel of God.” Thus “necessity is laid upon them, yea, woe is unto them, if “they do not preach the gospel.” Indeed, were we only to speak of promises and privileges, and indiscriminately to deal out consolation; all would go on very smoothly: but if we be faithful, we must “cry aloud, and not spare” either ourselves or the people, either professed believers or opposers; we must reprove men’s sins, and denounce the wrath of God against “every one who doeth evil.” Thus, our earnestness alone will excite the derision and mockery of the profane: and our faithful rebukes and warnings will exasperate the Pharisee and hypocrite. None will make any allowance for him, who will grant no indulgence to any man’s sins: all around will watch for the halting of the bold reprover; and report, with additions, whatever they spy of imperfection in his conduct. Even the harmlessness of the dove, and the wisdom of the serpent, could not exempt him from the defamation of those, who want to be revenged on him, for the terrors of conscience which he has occasioned them. But God will be with his servants: he sees the uprightness of their hearts, and approves their conduct: let them then open their cause before him, and he will enable them to foresee the ruin of their implacable enemies, and their own complete deliverance from the hands of all evil doers. And, were it not for unbelief and sin, they might rejoice and praise the Lord, with exulting Hallelujahs, and encourage others to do the same, in the hottest fire of persecution.

V. 14—18.

Alas! how frail, how mutable, how sinful is man in his best estate! How soon do our graces droop, and our corruptions revive, when we are left to ourselves! And how foolish, impious, and unnatural are the thoughts and wishes of our hearts, when we yield to impatience and discontent! Let us then “consider him, who endured the contradiction of sinners against himself, lest we be weary, and “faint in our minds,” under our lighter trials: (Notes, xii. 5, 6. Heb. xii. 1—3:) let us beg of him to enable us to keep our hearts, and to bridle our lips, under temptation: and let us accustom ourselves to view every object in the glass of eternity. For, if we have a good hope of eternal happiness, we cannot allow ourselves to wish that we had never been born; or to complain of those “light and “momentary afflictions, which are working for us a far “more exceeding and eternal weight of glory:” and, if we have not a good hope, we have more important matters to engage our attention, and should be otherwise employed than in fretting and murmuring about our present trials. But, as our gracious God bears with and forgives the infirmity and folly of his servants; let us learn to act with gentleness and forbearance, and tender sympathy towards those who are struggling with similar temptations, and even for a time are foiled by them; endeavouring to encourage and strengthen their hearts in God.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXI. V. 1, 2. We have been left to conjecture the time, in which most of the preceding prophecies were delivered: but many of those which follow are dated. This chapter leads us forward to the time of Zedekiah, and very near to the captivity: (Notes, xxxvii. 1—5. 2 Kings xxv. 1—5. Ez. xxi. 19—27:) yet we shall frequently be brought back to the preceding reigns.—When Nebuchadnezzar had shewn a determination to make war against Zedekiah, he was anxious to know the event: though that had been so often predicted, that nothing but the most determined incredulity could doubt of it. He was convinced, at some times at least, that Jeremiah was a true prophet, and he sent messengers to him on this occasion; who intreated him to enquire of the Lord, whether he would not appear for their deliverance, according to the wonders which he had formerly wrought for his people, that the king of Babylon might go up from them. Perhaps he meant to desire the prayers of the prophet: but neither he nor his messengers paid any regard to his warnings and exhortations, or made any attempts towards reformation, personal or public.—“Not that the king was touched ‘with repentance, ... and so sought to God, as did Hezekiah, when he sent to Isaiah: ... but because the prophet ‘might pray unto God to take this present plague away; ‘as Pharaoh sought unto Moses.’ (Notes, Ex. viii. 7, 8. 2 Kings xix. Acts viii. 18—24, v. 24.)—Pashur, here mentioned, was a different person, from Pashur, who put Jeremiah in the stocks. (Marg. Ref. b, c.—Note, xx. 1—6. xxxviii. 1—6.)

V. 4. God would so order it, that the weapons of the

with ye fight against the king of Babylon, and against the Chaldeans, which besiege you without the walls; and I will assemble them into the midst of this city.

5 And I myself will fight against you, with an out-stretched hand and with a strong arm, even in anger, and in fury, and in great wrath.

6 And I will smite the inhabitants of this city, both man and beast: they shall die of a great pestilence.

7 And afterwards, saith the LORD, I will deliver Zedekiah king of Judah, and his servants, and the people, and such as are left in this city from the pestilence, from the sword, and from the famine, into the hand of Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon, and into the hand of their enemies, and into the hand of those that seek their life: and he shall smite them with the edge of the sword; he shall not spare them, neither have pity, nor have mercy.

8 And unto this people thou shalt say, Thus saith the LORD; Behold, I set before you the way of life, and the way of death.

9 He that abideth in this city shall die by the sword, and by the famine, and by the pestilence: but he that goeth out, and falleth to the Chaldeans that besiege you, he shall live, and his life shall be unto him for a prey.

10 For I have set my face against this city for evil, and not for good, saith the LORD: it shall be given into the hand of the king of Babylon, and he shall burn it with fire.

11 ¶ And touching the house of the king of Judah, say, Hear ye the word of the LORD;

12 O house of David, thus saith the LORD; Execute judgment in the morning, and deliver him that is spoiled out of the hand of the oppressor, lest my fury go out like fire, and burn that none can quench it, because of the evil of your doings.

13 ¶ Behold, I am against thee, O inhabitant of the valley, and rock of Jews should hurt none but themselves.—Without the walls, &c.] Some think this message was sent, when the Chaldeans left the siege of Jerusalem to meet the Egyptian army: but this expression implies that the besiegers were at the time encamped against the city. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xxxvii. 6—10. Lam. i. 8—11.)

V. 5—7. God himself would fight against the Jews, by pestilence and famine, as well as by the sword of the Chaldeans. (Notes, xv. 1—4. xxxiv. 1—5. Ez. xiv. 12—21.)—The same expressions are used concerning the Lord's fighting against the Jews, as had formerly been employed in respect of his fighting for them, against the Egyptians and their other enemies. (Marg. Ref. i, k, n, o.)

V. 8—10. If the king and his princes refused to surrender, the people were called on to provide for their own safety; which could only be done by going over to the Chaldeans. (Notes, xxvii. 12—15. xxxviii. 1—6. Josh. ii. 1—6.)—As this was the express command of God, it fully released them from all obligation to obey their rulers, who acted in avowed defiance of him.

For a prey. (9) 'As a thing recovered from extreme danger.' Or, "instead of spoil."—'He ought to think himself a considerable gainer, by escaping with his life, in so general a destruction.' Lowth. (Notes, xxxix. 15—18. xlv. 4, 5.)—I have set, &c. (10) Marg. Ref. s, t.—Note, Am. ix. 1—4.

V. 11, 12. Some expositors suppose, that a new prophecy is here begun, which was delivered long before the rest of the chapter. But there is not the smallest intimation given of this: and it was proper even to the very time, in which judgment was executed, that exhortations to "repentance, and works meet for repentance," should be given along with denunciations of wrath. The justice of God in punishing the obstinate rebels, who refused to hearken, would be thus more fully illustrated. And, though the destruction of the city, and the captivity of the nation, had been absolutely determined: yet a variety of circumstances might exceedingly have mitigated the horrors of that catastrophe, especially to Zedekiah and his sons, had this exhortation been regarded. (Notes, xxxviii. 17—23. 2 Kings xxv. 6, 7. Ez. xii. 8—16. xvii. 12—21. xxi. 25—27.)—The wickedness of Zedekiah and his sons, and of the princes of that line, was aggravated by their relation to David. They probably trusted in the covenant of royalty, whilst their crimes forfeited their personal interest in it: and the exhortation implied a severe reproof of Zedekiah's conduct, as guilty of perversion of power and neglect of duty. But let him and his princes, immediately and earnestly, set themselves to execute justice, and deliver the oppressed: let them do it "in the morning," as their first concern, at that time when their courts were held, and every morning: or else the Lord's anger would burn unquenchably against them. CHAP. XXII.

The prophet is sent to the king's palace, to exhort him and his people to various duties, with conditional promises and threatenings, 1—9. The people are told not to weep for Josiah; but to lament for Shallum, who was carried captive to return no more, 10—12. Severe rebukes of Jehoiakim, and a dreadful sentence against him, 13—19. The Jews, who had been rebellious in prosperity, would be rendered more pliant by suffering, 20—23. The doom of Jeconiah, and others of David's family, 24—30.

THUS saith the LORD; * Go down to the house of the king of Judah, and speak there this word; exposes men to difficulty and reproach. Few therefore choose it; but most persist in that course, against which the most awful vengeance of God is denounced.—In all possible circumstances the way of duty is the safest and most advantageous; and will tend to alleviate those miseries, which cannot be entirely avoided. When sinners therefore enquire about events, they should be directed to the duties of their stations: those who are descended from pious ancestors, should be exhorted to imitate them; and they, who are placed in authority, should be reminded to execute justice and do good: otherwise these distinctions will the more expose men, when “the fury of the LORD goeth forth like fire, and burneth, that none can quench it, because of the evil of their doings.” He sets himself especially against those, who presumptuously defy his threatenings: and he will let them know, that none of their devices or confidences can withstand the power of his righteous indignation.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXII. V. 1. Some interpreters suppose that this chapter contains two distinct messages, the one ending at the twentieth verse, sent to Jehoiakim; and the other afterwards to Jeconiah or Jehoiachin his son: but there is in it not the most remote intimation of this. Others suppose, that the whole chapter was addressed to Jeconiah: and that the former part was a recapitulation of messages formerly delivered to Jehoiakim: but there is great difficulty, in applying the conclusion of the address to Jeconiah. It has therefore been supposed by a few, that the whole was addressed to Zedekiah, in the beginning of his reign, before matters were come to a crisis; and that it is a continuation of the subject of the preceding chapter. This interpretation I accede to: but without being very confident in so doubtful a matter. If this point could be ascertained, the difficulties would vanish, which upon other interpretations are almost, if not quite, insuperable; as it will be shewn: but there is no evidence on either side, except the chapter itself, compared with the context, of which the reader will judge for himself.—Yet it seems very reasonable to expect, that after Jeremiah had answered Zedekiah's enquiries by his messengers; the Lord should send him in person to confirm and enforce his word, in the manner here recorded: and the abrupt opening of the chapter, as well as its coincidence with the preceding, favours this opinion. (Notes, 2—5. xxi. 11, 12.)—No king of Judah is mentioned in this verse: Zedekiah is the only

The most obstinate sinners, yea, the most virulent persecutors, have seasons of compunction, and are sometimes convinced that their faithful reprovers are wiser and happier than they themselves are. So that in seasons of urgent distress and peril, men frequently desire the counsels and prayers of the very persons, whom at other times they despise or oppose: and thus the servants of God pass “through honour and dishonour, through evil and good report.” Such men indeed only enquire after deliverance from punishment: (P. O. Matt. viii. 28—34;) if the Lord would deal with them according to the riches of his power and mercy, in saving them from suffering, and then leave them to indulge themselves in sin, they would be reconciled to him and to his ministers: and they will meet with teachers, who will encourage them on this plan, for a valuable consideration to themselves. But the faithful servant of God is zealous for his Master's honour, and adheres to his instructions: he can encourage no man, who refuses to “repent and do works meet for repentance:” he will constantly maintain, that those who hate and disobey the precepts, have no interest in the promises of God; and that he will not deal with hypocrites according to the wonders which he performs for his people.—When they, who stand out in obstinate disobedience, would presume on external privileges: let them be told, that God will prosper his open enemies against them; nay, that he will baffle all their efforts, and fight against them by his own out-stretched arm, and not spare them or shew them any favour. Yet intimations of mercy are couched under the severest denunciations: and in the most tremendous public calamities, there is hope for individuals of escaping the wrath to come. No sinner on earth, who desires to avail himself of a refuge, is left without one: life and death are continually set before men: but the way of life is humiliating; it requires self-denial and singularity, and one named in the preceding chapter : and it seems very unnatural to consider the first verse of this chapter, as beginning an entirely new message from God.—We suppose then, that Zedekiah is addressed : and that the names of the other kings are introduced, by way of reminding him, that the predictions concerning them, which they had disregarded, had been exactly accomplished ; from which he ought to infer, that those, which related to him and the approaching captivity, would be so likewise. Coniah indeed is last mentioned in the chapter, and Zedekiah is not named in it, but he had been mentioned in the former part of the subject, as the foregoing chapter is here supposed to have been : and being addressed in person as king of Judah, it was not necessary to address him by name.

V. 2—5. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xvii. 19—27. xxi. 11, 12. xxiv. 8—22. xxxvi. 1—3.) ‘ This was his ordinary manner of preaching before kings, from Josiah to Zedekiah, which was about forty years.’—The prophet repeats to Zedekiah the admonitions which he had given to his predecessors, connected with similar promises and denunciations : and the express declarations made in other places, that the city could be taken and destroyed, only implied that God certainly foreknew Zedekiah’s obstinate disobedience. Thus, the Lord again and again sent Moses to Pharaoh, to demand the liberty of Israel, though he knew and foretold, that Pharaoh would not let them go till forced to it. (Note, xviii. —10.)

V. 6. (Note, 13—19.) The palace of the kings of Judah was become very magnificent : it had been favoured far more than the residence of other kings, and made pre-eminent by its vicinity to the temple ; and the royal family had been equally favoured and exalted by the covenant with David and his seed : (Notes, Ps. xlviii. 2, 3. cxxii. 3—5.) but, having been polluted with idolatry and iniquity, they were condemned to be destroyed and made desolate.—Gilead was renowned for rich pastures, and Lebanon for stately cedars. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 7. (Marg. Ref.—Note, xxi. 13, 14.) ‘ The Hebrew word signifieth to sanctify, because the LORD doth dedicate to his use and purpose, such as he prepareth to execute his work.’ (Notes, Is. xiii. 2—5. xlv. 1—6. Ez. ix. 1—7.)

V. 8, 9. Marg. Ref.—Notes, xl. 2, 3. Deut. xxviii. 37. xxix. 21—25. 1 Kings ix. 7—9.

V. 10—12. The ruin of the kingdom of Judah commenced by the death of Josiah : the prophet therefore referred to that event ; and referred to predictions which were delivered soon after, when Jehoahaz, or Shallum, had been carried away captive into Egypt by Pharaoh-necho. (Notes, 2 Kings xxii. 15—20, v. 20. xxiii. 29—33.) The people indeed had great cause to mourn their own loss in Josiah’s death ; and for their sins, which had provoked the Lord to remove him : yet they needed not bemoan him, as if he had suffered loss, by being “ taken away from the evil to come,” for he died in reputation, and at peace with God. (Note, 2 Chr. xxxv. 25—27.) But they had a more recent cause for sorrow in the captivity of Shallum, who was doomed, for his early wickedness, to live and die a captive in Egypt, and never more to return to his own land. The people, it seems, did not believe this prediction, at the time when it was uttered: but it had been exactly verified. And this very properly came in to confirm the predictions that were afterwards delivered, and which were treated with similar disregard.—We must adopt this interpretation, whether we suppose Jeconiah or Zedekiah to be addressed.—“Thus saith the LORD:” or rather, “Thus the LORD said, &c.” He spake thus by the prophet, at the time. The verb is preterite. ‘I shall lay’ this down as most probable, that the Shallum, mentioned in the text, is the same as Jehoahaz; for the characters here set down can agree with no other. It was he that reigned instead of his father Josiah. ... He likewise was carried captive, and never returned.’ Lowth.—Indeed Shallum mentioned in Chronicles, (Note, 1 Chr. iii. 15,) is placed after Zedekiah; as if younger than he; but Jehoahaz was older than Zedekiah by eleven or twelve years. (2 Kings xxiii. 31. xxiv. 18.) Either therefore, the age of Josiah’s sons was not intended, or the order has been inverted. “The third Shallum, the fourth Zedekiah.” Blayney.

V. 13—19. These verses evidently relate to Jehoiakim, who succeeded his younger brother Jehoahaz, or Shallum; (Note, 10—12;) but it is a question whether they were, on this occasion, addressed to him, or whether they were adduced in confirmation of other predictions. According to the interpretation here adopted, the case of Jehoiakim was adduced, to convince Zedekiah that the predictions, uttered against him and Jerusalem, would certainly be accomplished.—Jehoiakim, it seems, had built a magnificent palace in those calamitous times, the expense of which far exceeded his finances: and this introduced a system of iniquity and oppression. (Note, xxi. 11, 12.) He constrained his subjects to work without wages, and in various ways he committed extortion and injustice: ‘A crying sin, and too common among the great men of the world. ... Deut. xxiv. 14, 15. Jam. v. 4.’ Lowth.—But, did he think that his house of cedar would secure his authority, or prolong his reign, or give him inward tranquillity? His pious father had not affected such splendour: but he lived in plenty and hospitality, without injuring any of his subjects; and his clear conscience and character, the love of his people, and above all the favour of God, were far preferable to Jehoiakim’s guilty and odious magnificence. Moreover, Josiah was the patron of the poor, and his throne was established in righteousness: and his obedience to God, and imitation of his justice, truth, and goodness, in the use of his authority, proved that he knew and loved him. (Notes, ix. 23, 24. 1 Chr. xxviii. 9. John xvii. 1—3. 1 John ii. 3—6.) But Jehoiakim was continually looking out for opportunities of gratifying his enormous rapacity, and inordinate passions; in pursuit of iniquitous gain, he committed murder and every kind of oppression; and thus he became odious to his subjects: so that it had been predicted, that when he should be prematurely cut off, his relations would not grieve for him as a brother, nor his people as a ruler, nor would any lament that his glory was turned into ignominy, nor condole with his bereaved consort and relations, according to the customs of those times and countries: and after his death his body would be treated with the utmost contempt, and “buried with the burial of an ass;” which creatures, when they die in the city, were dragged forth to some place without the gates, where rubbish was thrown, to be devoured by dogs or to putrefy above ground. “Nebuchadnezzar ... bound him in fetters, to carry him to Babylon:” (2 Chr. xxxvi. 6, 7:) this however, seems to have taken place, in the fourth year of Jehoiakim’s reign; (Note, Dan. i. 1, 2;) and it is generally supposed, that, having pacified Nebuchadnezzar, he was restored to the throne: but, that after some time revolting from him, bands of Chaldees and others came against him, by whom he was at length perhaps killed in an assault, after having reigned eleven years (Note, 2 Kings xxiv. 1, 2.) Yet the language of Ezekiel (Note, Ez. xix. 2—9,) seems to imply, that he was put in chains, and brought to the king of Babylon, at the close of his reign; “that his voice should no more be heard upon the mountains of Israel.” Josephus, however,

20 ¶ Go up to Lebanon ° and cry: and lift up thy voice in Bashan, and cry from the passages: ° for all thy lovers are destroyed.

21 I ° spake unto thee in thy * prosperity; but thou saidst, I will not hear. ° This hath been thy manner from thy youth, that thou obeyedst not my voice.

22 The ° wind shall eat up all ° thy pastors, and ° thy lovers shall go into captivity: ° surely then shalt thou be ashamed and confounded for all thy wickedness.

23 O ° inhabitant of ° Lebanon, that ° makest thy nest in the cedars, ° how gracious shalt thou be ° when pangs come upon thee, the pain as of a woman in travail!

24 As I live, saith the LORD, though

Coniah the son of Jehoiakim king of Judah were ° the signet upon my right hand, yet would I pluck thee thence;

25 And ° I will give thee into the hand of them that seek thy life, and into the hand of them ° whose face thou fearest, even into the hand of Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon, and into the hand of the Chaldeans.

26 And ° I will cast thee out, and thy mother that bare thee, into another country, where ye were not born; and there shall ye die.

27 But ° to the land whereunto they ° desire to return, thither shall they not return.

28 ¶ Is this man ° Coniah ° a despised broken idol? is he a vessel wherein is no pleasure? wherefore are they cast out, he and ° his seed, and are cast into a land ° which they know not?

says, that he was slain, and his body left unburied. There is great difficulty, in respect of the time, and manner, and place of Jehoiakim's death and burial; probably such as must baffle all attempts to clear them up: but, as "the gates of Jerusalem" may relate to the burial of the ass, and not to Jehoiakim; it is not very important to enquire whether this took place near Jerusalem, or at Babylon. Doubtless the exact fulfilment of the prediction was well known at Jerusalem. (xxxvi. 30.)—"Thus saith." (18) Or, "Thus said, &c." (Note, 10—12.)

V. 20—23. These verses seem to relate to the nation of Judah at large; or to the royal house of David, addressed as a woman of high rank and spirit: and it may be considered as the prophet's language on the success of the Chaldeans, and the disappointment of assistance from Egypt. (Notes, xxxvii. 1—10.) The princes and people might now betake themselves to Lebanon, or Bashan, or the other entrances into the land, to lament their miseries, and cry for help: but none would regard them; for all their idols and idolatrous allies, were about to be destroyed by the power of the conqueror. (Notes, ii. 33—37. iv. 30, 31. Is. xxxi. 1—3. Lam. iv. 17. Ez. xvi. 35—43. xxiii. 6—10. 27. 43—49. Hos. ii. 2—7.) The Lord had warned them of these calamities, in their more prosperous days, and commanded them to repent of their sins; but they were avowed and obstinate in rebellion: and this had been the manner of the nation from the beginning, that they would not obey his voice. (Marg. Ref. r.—Notes, iii. 20—25. vii. 21—23.) Therefore, all their rulers and teachers would perish, as the fruits of the earth are blighted and consumed by an unwholesome wind: and their allies would go with them into captivity, being reduced by the same powerful conqueror. (Notes, ii. 8, 9. iv. 11—13.) They thought themselves indeed as safe in Jerusalem, as the eagle in her nest, on the top of a cedar, upon the summits of Lebanon; and therefore they despised the word of God. (Marg. Ref. z.—Notes, xxi. 13, 14. xlix. 16.) But destruction was coming, as pangs on a woman in travail; and then they would shew some regard to the Lord, and assume the appearance of humility, of devotion, or of mercy to their oppressed brethren; but this would not prevent their ruin. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Hos. vi. 4, 5. vii. 13—16.)

V. 24—27. After the removal of Jehoiakim, Jeconiah reigned for a short time, and was then taken prisoner and carried to Babylon; where he continued many years before his death. (Notes, 2 Kings xxiv. 8—16. 2 Chr. xxxvi. 9, 10.) He is here called Coniah, in contempt, as it is generally thought: the first syllable of his name, being a part of the name of JEHOVAH, is cut off, perhaps as an intimation that the Lord no longer owned him. Perhaps Coniah was his original name, and the additional syllable was added when he became king.—As he was the lineal heir of the house of David, it might have been thought that God would have taken special care of him: but he swore by himself, that, even were Coniah to him like the royal signet on the right hand of a king, his ornament and a peculiar badge of authority; (Note, Hag. ii. 20—23, v. 23;) he would pluck him off and cast him away with disdain: and that he should end his days in captivity, with his mother who had brought him up in iniquity, and with the rest of his family. (Note, 2 Kings xxv. 27—30.)—Nothing can be more unnatural, than to suppose these verses addressed to Jeconiah, during his father's reign, when he was quite young; and had no immediate prospect of reigning: yet on this supposition those expositors must proceed, who maintain that the whole was addressed to Jehoiakim.

V. 28—30. This is the application of the whole address, which is here supposed to have been made to Zedekiah. Indeed it should be carefully noted, that Jeconiah is spoken of as absent, and as already in captivity (28). Now, had he been thrown aside as a broken idol, than which nothing can be more despicable; or as a vessel which a man cares not to make use of? For what reason was he and his seed carried captive to Babylon? Was it not for their sins? And did Zedekiah, who copied and far exceeded them, expect to prosper on the throne of David? If he would pay no regard to the word of God, let the earth itself hear and record it: (Marg. Ref. n:) for the Lord had determined, that this man, (to whom the prophet addressed himself,) should die childless, and be unsuccessful all his days; and that none of his seed should prosper, filling the throne of David, and ruling over Judah; as he had vainly expected after his nephew Jeconiah was carried captive. If we understand this of Zedekiah, the whole is plain and obvious: he was taken prisoner by Nebuchadnezzar; his sons were slain before his eyes; then his eyes were put out, he was carried to Babylon, and we read no more of him or his posterity. (Notes, xxxviii. 20—23.—xli. 10. xliii. 4—7, v. 6. 2 Kings xxv. 6, 7. Ez. xii. 8—16. xvii. 12—21. xxi. 25—27.) But if we apply it to Jeconiah, we are involved in difficulties. He certainly left several sons: Zerubbabel his grandson possessed great authority, and prospered ruling in Judah; and was spoken of in the language used in this chapter of Jeconiah. (24. Notes, Ezra i. 7—11. iii. 8—11. Hag. i. 1. 13—15. ii. 3—5. 20—23. Zech. iv. 4—10.) Jeconiah's name stands in the genealogy of our Lord, as one of the line of David, from whom Joseph the husband of Mary was descended. (Note, Matt. i. 2—17, v. 12.) Nay, Jeconiah himself may be said to have prospered towards the close of his day. (Note, 2 Kings xxv. 27—30.) So that this sentence seems not to have been executed respecting him, in any measure answerable to the peculiar solemnity, with which it was denounced.—To obviate these difficulties, some conjecture that Salathiel, the father of Zerubbabel, was only the adopted son of Jeconiah: but it is expressly said, that “he begat him,” which can hardly mean less than that he was his ancestor: (1 Chr. iii. 17. Matt. i. 12:) and such an interpretation would reduce the genealogy of Christ, and indeed all other genealogies, to uncertainty. Others suppose, that the sentence only meant that he should not see any comfort in his children, and that they should not succeed him on the throne; and that after the death of Zedekiah, the temporal kingdom of David should terminate: but the word, rendered “childless,” occurs only in two other places; and both seem to confirm our translation of it. (Gen. xv. 2. Lev. xx. 21.) Certainly Zerubbabel “ruled prosperously in Judah,” though he did not sit on the throne of David.—As to the opinion, that the Salathiel and Zorobabel, in the line of Nathan, must be the same as the Salathiel and Zerubbabel in the line of Solomon; though neither their ancestors nor their descendants were the same; nothing, but the countenance and sanction of so many learned men, could entitle it to the least degree of attention. For the coincidence of names, in the same nation and the same family, is so very common in all history, that one cannot but wonder to see so much built upon it in this instance. (Notes, 1 Chr. iii. 17, 18. Luke iii. 23—38.)—But, having suggested what appears to me the most obvious method of removing the difficulty, which I allow to be great; I shall only add, that there seems a peculiar propriety in the prophet's thus adducing former instances of the Lord's performing his predictions, as an introduction to passing this solemn sentence of condemnation on him, under whose government, and through whose obstinacy, Jerusalem was destroyed, and the people carried into captivity. (Notes, xxi. 4—10. xxxviii. 17—23. 2 Kings xxiv. 20. Ez. xvii. 15—21. xxi. 25—27.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12

The mightiest princes are at least as much concerned to hear the word of God, as their meanest subjects; and those who are called to speak to them in the name of God, should deal plainly and faithfully with them: for their servants and people are deeply concerned in their conduct, and are generally influenced by it: and few venture to speak unwelcome truths in their presence.—No durable prosperity in any station can be obtained without obedience to God's commandments. Nor can real religion subsist without justice, truth, and mercy, in our relative conduct.—They, who are entrusted with authority, are under the greatest obligations to imitate our God, in patronizing the poor and rescuing the oppressed: and innocent blood shed by them, under colour of law, or by iniquitous wars, or in any other way, must be as exactly accounted for, as that which their inferiors shed in violation of their statutes. The neglect of these things exposes nations to the righteous vengeance of God: and he alike disregards temples and palaces, when those who frequent or possess them, will not obey his word. He destroys neither cities, nations, nor individuals, except for their sins; and even in this world he often makes it obvious to every one, for what crimes he inflicts punishment: but this will be fully manifest to all the world, at “the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men.”—It is more reasonable to congratulate those who have escaped from this world of sin and sorrow, and are arrived at the mansions of the blest, than to lament them; and their happiness should reconcile survivors to their own loss. But impenitent sinners, living or dying, are objects of our deepest compassion or lamentation. Speedily death will remove the most prosperous from “their good things,” “their place will know them no more,” and they have a place of torment prepared for them in the eternal world. Yet others will proceed in the same destructive course, in defiance of all warnings and expostulations!

V. 13—19.

Men imagine that wealth, magnificence, elegant mansions, furniture, paintings, and splendid vanities, give happiness to their possessors: and in order to acquire them they often commit the most atrocious crimes, and expose themselves to the severest vengeance of their offended Judge. How many grand houses have thus been builded by unrighteousness! How many live in magnificence and luxury, by oppressing and defrauding the poor; and by

CHAP. XXIII.

A woe is denounced on the corrupt pastors, and the restoration of the scattered flock is predicted, 1—4. A prophecy of the kingdom and righteousness of Christ, and of the gathering of the people to him, 5—8. The wickedness of the nation charged on the priests and false prophets, 9—15. The people are cautioned against hearkening to false prophets, and instructed how to distinguish them; with sharp rebukes and terrible threatenings against them, 16—32. A rebuke of those who made a scoff at the words of the true prophets, 33—40.

WOE be unto ^b the pastors that destroy and scatter the sheep of my pasture! saith the LORD.

2 Therefore thus saith the LORD

God of Israel, against the pastors that feed my people; Ye have scattered my flock, and driven them away, ^c and have not visited them: behold, ^d I will visit upon you the evil of your doings, saith the LORD.

3 And ^e I will gather the remnant of my flock out of all countries whither I have driven them, and will bring them again to their folds; and they shall be fruitful and increase.

4 And ^f I will set up shepherds over them which shall feed them: and they shall fear no more, nor be dismayed, ^g neither shall they be lacking, saith the LORD.

constraining them to excessive labour, without any adequate compensation for their work! How many thus run into debt, and defraud their creditors; at least so delay payment, as to ruin honest families, to gratify their infamous ostentation! And indeed all, who determine to be rich, or luxurious, will fall into these and various other temptations, and be betrayed into some species of injustice. (Note, 1 Tim. vi. 6—10.)—Generally, the pride and vanity of young persons, in wanting to make a more genteel appearance, than their prudent or pious parents did, prove them defective in more valuable accomplishments; especially if their circumstances are not more affluent. It is unspeakably more respectable and comfortable to have food and raiment, and other accommodations, in a plain style, with honesty and piety; and to use hospitality, be friendly to the poor, and to have an interest in their prayers; than to fare sumptuously, to lodge magnificently, to be surrounded with numerous servants and visitants; whilst extravagance puts an edge on rapacity, and “the eyes and heart are only after covetousness,” oppression, and other crimes, which luxury renders necessary.—They who “know God,” will do justice and love mercy; and it will be well with them living and dying: but those who dishonour him will be disgraced; and when ostentatious and oppressive rulers are removed, and none lament their death; it is an awful token, that they are gone to receive the due recompence of their crimes.

V. 20—30.

Such, as in prosperity will not hear the voice of God by his word, must feel the strokes of his correcting rod; and, if this does not produce a salutary effect, be overwhelmed and confounded by his awful judgments. Then all helpers and confidences will fail; and the perishing transgressors will cry for mercy and not be heard, when “sudden destruction cometh upon them, as pangs upon the travailing woman.” Indeed it has been too much the way with all of us from our youth, that, in prosperity and health, we would not obey the voice of God: and, when visited with chastisements, we have many of us repeatedly appeared very gracious, and made many professions and resolutions of amendment; which we have broken, as soon as our danger was past, and the terror worn off. Yet the Lord often blesses affliction as a means of bringing sinners to repentance.—Alas! how little is earthly grandeur to be depended on, or flourishing families to be rejoiced in! Soon the greatest may be thrown down into the most abject misery, and children may be torn from us in the most distressing manner: nor can any external relation to God secure a man from being given into the hands of that enemy, who seeks the life of our souls. But they, who “hear the voice of Christ, and follow him, have eternal life, and shall never perish, neither shall any enemy pluck them out of his” almighty “hands.” (Note, John x. 26—31.) May this be our character, our honour, and our felicity!

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIII. V. 1, 2. Israel was the flock of God, of which he had taken special care, and on which he had set a peculiar value. (Marg. Ref. a, b.)—Judah was at that time his visible church, in which there was a remnant of true believers: from that people the promised Saviour was at length to arise: and the king, his counsellors and chief officers, with the high priest, the chief priests, and those in authority under them, were the pastors or shepherds who were appointed to feed and protect the flock, both in respect of their temporal welfare, and their spiritual estate. (Notes, ii. 8, 9. x. 19—22. xxii. 20—23. Is. lvi. 9—12. Ez. xxxiv. 1—22. John x. 1—13.) But the oppression and persecution of the civil rulers; their neglect of duty, and their bad policy, tended to destroy the people, to expose them to the sword of their enemies, to drive them to seek shelter in foreign countries, and to reduce them to captivity: and their wickedness ended in the desolations of the land, and the scattering of the people among the heathen: while the ignorance, negligence, false doctrine, and wickedness of the priests, were equally ruinous to their souls. Thus they abused their trust, and were condemned to be deposed and punished for their crimes.—There is no reason to think that this is a continuation of the preceding prophecy; or that it was addressed to Jehoiakim.

tion of the remnant of the Jews, and their re-establishment in their own land; and of their increase and prosperity, under the government and instruction of Zerubbabel, Joshua, Ezra, and Nehemiah; who ruled over them in the fear of God, and under whom they lived in a measure of peace and confidence: yet the full accomplishment of the prophecy must be referred to the times of the gospel, to the true flock of Christ, and to their entire safety and holy confidence in him.—Lacking. (4) Or, visited by such calamities, as in former times. (Notes, 5—8. xvi. 14, 15. xxxii. 37, 38. Ez. xxxiv. 23—31. xxxvi. 20—24. 31. xxxix. 23—29.)

V. 5, 6. (Notes, xxii. 28—30. Ps. lxxx. 14, 15. Is. iv. 2. xi. 1—5. Ez. xvii. 22—24. Zech. iii. 8. vi. 12, 13.) The time would speedily approach, when, instead of the degenerate branches from the stock of David, who had brought Judah to ruin, "a righteous Branch" would spring from him; who would reign in wisdom and prosperity, and execute justice in the land and throughout the earth. (Notes, xxi. 11, 12. 2 Sam. xxiii. 3, 4. Ps. xlv. 6, 7. lxxii. 1—7. Is. ix. 6, 7. xxxii. 1, 2. Luke i. 67—75.) Under his government the people of God, being saved from wrath and sin, and protected from their enemies, would dwell in peace and safety: and men would call this Branch of David, "JEHOVAH OUR RIGHTEOUSNESS." (Notes, xxxiii. 14—16. Is. xlv. 23—25.) Though descended from David according to the flesh, he would be indeed JEHOVAH, God in human nature, One with the Father: and he would be called by all believers, "Our righteousness;" for they are "made the righteousness of God in him." (Notes, 1 Cor. i. 26—31, v. 30. 2 Cor. v. 18—21, v. 21.) His obedience unto death is their justifying righteousness, and title to heavenly felicity: and their inherent righteousness, their sanctification, the source of all their personal obedience, and their meetness for heaven, is the effect of their union with him, and of the supply of his Spirit. Christ is JEHOVAH, and in every sense OUR RIGHTEOUSNESS. This interpretation coincides with the whole tenour of scripture, and arises from the grammatical construction, according to a well known idiom of the Hebrew.—"This is the name, which he, (or, one,) shall call him, JEHOVAH our Righteousness."—"This is the name, by which JEHOVAH shall call him, OUR RIGHTEOUSNESS."

"EOUSNESS." God would make him such as he called him, 'i. e. Our Righteousness. ... The LXX have so translated 'before me.' Blayney. He does not however produce their translation, which may thus be literally rendered: "This is his name, which the Lord shall call him, Josedek in the prophets."—Josedek is compounded of the first syllable of JEHOVAH and Zedek righteous. It was the name of one of the sacerdotal line mentioned by the prophets, being an ancestor of Joshua who was the high priest after the captivity. (1 Chr. vi. 14, 15. Ezra iii. 2. Hag. i. 1. 12. 14. ii. 2. 4. Zech. vi. 11.) To this "Josedek in the prophets" these translators seem to have applied the passage; but on what account it does not appear.—They say nothing, however, of "Our Righteousness;" this authority, therefore, does not at all aid the translation.—If the words had been, "Their Righteousness," Dr. Blayney's interpretation would have been more plausible: but the meaning of "Our Righteousness," as here connected, has no consistent meaning; for Our is a pronoun without any antecedent, whereas the explanation above stated is clear; every one of those spoken of, yea all of them with one consent, shall call him, "The LORD OUR RIGHTEOUSNESS." He adds, 'This doctrine,' (that of our Lord's divinity,) '... draws its decisive proofs from the New Testament only.'—To this assertion it will be sufficient to subjoin one on the other side. 'The title of JEHOVAH is elsewhere given to the Messiah by the prophets. Lowth. (Notes, Ps. xlv. 6, 7. Is. vii. 14. ix. 6, 7. xl. 9—11. Hos. i. 6, 7. Zech. ii. 6—13.)—Branch. (5) Ανατολη Sept. V. 7, 8. (Note, xvi. 14, 15.) These words, as repeated in this connexion, imply that the Jews and Israelites who converted to Christianity, will be restored to their own land.—'This wonderful work of God's, in restoring the Jewish nation after their dispersions all the world over (together with the bringing in the fulness of the Gentiles which will be likewise brought to pass by this means,) .. will so far exceed the miracles which he wrought in their deliverance out of Egypt, that this latter will not deserve to be compared or mentioned with the former. St. Paul calls this restoration of the Jews "life from the dead." Lowth. (Notes, Rom. xi. 11—24.)

of Christ, and many future blessings, in reserve for the church, and for Israel, in order to encourage the faith and hope of the pious remnant; here returns to reprove, convict, and pass sentence on, his contemporaries. His heart was broken with sorrow, and his frame was most violently agitated, to see the people deluded by the false prophets: (Notes, xiv. 13—18:) and he was so filled with amazement and zeal, that he spake with vehemency and incoherency, and acted with impetuosity, like a drunken man; (Notes, Is. li. 21—23. Lam. iii. 14—16;) when he considered the justice and power of God as armed against the nation, and the holy denunciations of his vengeance which he had been sent to proclaim; or, when he compared the precepts and sanctions of the law with the crimes of the people.—For the whole land was filled with adulterers, and profane and perjured persons; for whose iniquities the Lord had begun by drought and famine to punish it, and had burnt up its pleasant pastures. But the people still proceeded in their evil course, and did wrong with impetuous violence, and with all their power. In this impiety the prophets and priests were the ringleaders; nay, they chose the temple as the scene of their enormities! therefore the Lord, who witnessed their crimes, condemned them to be driven forward in their ruinous ways into final destruction; as those who are driven headlong on slippery paths in the dark, till they are cast down some precipice and dashed in pieces. (Marg. Ref. e, f.—Notes, xiii. 15—17. Ps. lxxiii. 18—22. Prov. iv. 18, 19.)

Swearing. (10) 'By swearing is chiefly here meant perjury. ... Hos. iv. 2. The Hebrew word signifies indifferently swearing or cursing. The Jewish forms of adjuration, used in their courts of justice ... had usually an imprecation joined to them. So the words import, that men ventured to forswear themselves, and incur the imprecation implied in an oath, rather than discover the 'truth. ... Prov. xxix. 24. This, the prophet saith, is one of those crying sins, for which God hath visited the nation with severe judgments. And the sins here mentioned, which did abound so much among the people, were in a great measure owing to the ill example of the priests and prophets.' Lowth. (Notes, Prov. xxix. 24. xxx. 7—9. Hos. iv. 1—3.)

V. 13—15. The false prophets of Samaria, who foolishly and impiously prophesied in the name of Baal, had deluded the Israelites into those idolatries, which ruined the nation: yet the Lord considered the false prophets of Jerusalem, who prophesied lies in his name, as guilty of more horrible and abominable wickedness. For they were abandoned to adultery and deceit: and their prophesying was a constant imposture, through which the people were hardened and emboldened in iniquity, by expecting peace and prosperity; and prejudiced against the true prophets, who called on them to return from their wickedness. (Notes, 23—27. Ez. xiii. 17—23, v. 22.) Thus the whole nation were become as odious to the Lord, as the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah; and would soon be visited with judgments almost as tremendous. (Note, Lam. iv. 3—6.) But the prophets especially would be constrained to drink the most bitter part of this cup of God's indignation: as their false doctrine, pretended visions, and corrupt examples, had spread impiety or hypocrisy (marg.) throughout the land, and frustrated all the means used to retard its progress. (Notes, vi. 13—15. viii. 10—12.) The prophets of Judah 'pronounced their false prophecies in the name of the true God, and entitled him to all their impostures; the wickedness of their lives also reflected a dishonour on his name and religion.' Lowth.—'They that should have profited by my rods against Samaria, are become worse than they.' (Note, iii. 6—11.)

V. 18. This may be understood as the scoffing language of the false prophets, who opposed Jeremiah and others, when they declared to them the counsel and purpose of God to destroy them and the city. They derided their pretensions to inspiration: and enquired, which of them was of the Lord’s privy council, and made acquainted with his secret; and whether they alone had perceived and heard his word. (Note, 1 Kings xxii. 24, 25.) They thought it not likely that two or three inconsiderable persons should know more concerning the will of God, than the numbers of respectable persons among the chief priests and prophets, who predicted peace and prosperity: and they were amazed at the confidence with which they uttered their prophecies.—But, on the other hand, the words may be interpreted as spoken by Jeremiah, demanding of the false prophets, which of them had received any revelation from God, or indeed understood any thing of his word.—‘The context shews, that he designs by that question, to exclude only the carnal or natural man, from ‘being enlightened from above, or being a competent ‘judge of divine truths.’ Lowth. The anger of the LORD shall not return, &c. (20) ‘Is. ‘lv. 11. The expression is taken from a messenger that ‘comes back without doing his business.’ Lowth.—[In the latter days, &c.] The execution of the predicted judgments would effectually convince the people, that the prophet spake by authority from JEHOVAH. In those future days, the surviving captives at Babylon, and they who lost their lives and were in the eternal world, would have leisure fully to consider the subject: and then they would reflect on their own incredulity and obstinacy, with bitter remorse and indignation at themselves, for their folly and madness.—But the latter days generally mean the times of the Messiah, and even the latest ages of the world; and the full consideration and understanding of their present unparalleled dispersion, after so many ages, and of the sins which provoked God thus to deal with their before highly favoured nation, will make way for the conversion of Israel and Judah to Christ, and their restoration to their own land. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 5—8. xxx. 23, 24.)

V. 21, 22. ‘He sheweth the difference between the ‘true prophets and the false; between the hireling and ‘the true minister.’—The Lord here solemnly disowned the prophets, who at that time promised the people peace. (Notes, xiv. 13—16. xxvii. 13—15.) They forwardly engaged in the work, and their predictions coincided with the corrupt inclinations of the people: (Note, v. 30, 31;) they ran of their own accord, and prophesied out of their own heart, and all went on very smoothly. (Notes, vi. 13—15. Ez. xiii. 10—16.) But if indeed they had “stood ‘in the counsel of the LORD;” (Note, 18;) and had spoken his words to the people: their grand object would have been to bring them to repentance, and to turn them from all their idolatries and iniquities to the worship of JEHOVAH. This would have been the tendency of their lives and doctrine; and they would have had some measure of success. (Note, Is. lv. 10, 11.) But their object, and the tendency and effect of their prognostications, were entirely the reverse of this. (Note, 13—15.)—If it be enquired, how the people might know the false prophets from those who were sent of God, when the latter wrought no miracles; the obvious answer is this: the ministry of the true prophets was coincident with the law of Moses, and its precepts, promises, and threatenings; and with the writings of the preceding prophets: whereas the false prophets, in their predictions, ran counter to these sacred records. The instructions and example of the true prophets evidently tended to bring men to repentance, faith, serious godliness, and universal righteousness: those of the false prophets led them to rest in forms and notions, and to be quiet in their sins: and these are still the rules, by which the faithful ministers of Christ are to be distinguished from false teachers. (Notes, Matt. vii. 15—23.)—‘Giving encouragement to men’s carnal security, ‘is often mentioned as a mark of a false prophet.’ Lowth.—But, in respect of immediate revelations, the ministry of the true prophets admitted of another kind of proof. No miracles indeed, or even predictions verified by the event, could prove that man a true prophet, whose doctrine evidently contradicted any of the leading truths and precepts of the preceding scriptures: (Note, Deut. xiii. 1—5;) in all other cases the accomplishment of such predictions, as related to their own times, generally confirmed those prophecies which referred to more remote events.

V. 23, 24. Did the false prophets think to hide their crimes from God? or teach the people that he could not pursue them with his vengeance into distant countries, or detect their most secret crimes? Did they suppose that he only knew what was doing in heaven, and was not present on the earth also, and in those corners which lay most remote from human observation? Could they hope to avoid inspection, or escape vengeance of God, whose presence fills heaven and earth? (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Job xxii. 5—14. Ps. xciv. 1—9. cxxxix. 1—12. Is. xxix. 13—16. Ez. viii. 7—12.)

V. 25—27. The false prophets professed, that they had revelations from God in supernatural dreams; and they caused this to be rumoured abroad. But the Lord declared that it was an imposture: for they only spake their own conjectures, the result of the pride and presumption of their own deceitful hearts. Their purpose, as well as the tendency of their lying predictions, was to seduce the people into forgetfulness of God, and contempt of his word; that they might graft idolatry and superstition on their infidelity, and so render them their attached and submissive followers. (Notes, 32. xxix. 8, 9. 24—32.)—‘ Their giving heed to these false prophets, is as effectual a way of making my people forget me and my laws, as the setting up an idolatrous way of worship, which hath been too successfully practised by their fathers.’ Lowth. (Notes, Matt. vii. 15—23. xxiv. 23—25. 2 Cor. xi. 13—15. 1 Tim. iv. 1—5. 2 Pet. ii. 1—3. 1 John iv. 1—6. Rev. xii. 13—17. xiii. 2—4.)

V. 28, 29. Let then the matter be brought to decision, between the different descriptions of prophets. Let these dreamers declare openly their dreams; and let the true prophets faithfully deliver their message; and the difference would be as evident to the impartial enquirer, as that between “the chaff and the wheat.” The dreams of the false prophets would appear slight, superficial, and calculated to flatter the pride and soothe the consciences of ungodly men: (Note, 32:) but the word of God, faithfully spoken by his servants, would appear weighty, interesting, suited to alarm the sinner’s conscience, and to excite reverence of the divine authority, and conducive to repentance and holiness. For “Is not the word of God like as a fire?” This element penetrates, enlivens, illuminates, softens, melts, purifies, consumes, or transforms every substance into its own nature. Thus the sacred word penetrates the conscience, quickens and illuminates the mind, softens and melts the heart, purifies the affections, consumes the dross of sin, and transforms the believer’s soul into its own holy nature. (Notes, Matt. iii. 11, 12. vii. 28, 29. Acts ii. 2, 3. 2 Cor. iv. 1, 2. Heb. iv. 12, 13.) As a hammer also, it breaks down the presumptuous confidence of the proud and stout-hearted, and renders them broken and contrite in spirit; and it crushes the rebellion and obstinacy of the will, and produces humble submission and obedience. This is the genuine tendency of the uncorrupted word of God, and these effects are produced where it is truly believed: but false doctrine is coincident with the pride and lusts of the human heart; and the more firmly it is believed, the faster are the chains of sin riveted, and the more is conscience stupified in impenitence, and the will fixed in obstinate rebellion.—‘ Let not these false pretences to dreams or visions discourage the true prophets from the faithful discharge of their office: for the difference between true prophecies and counterfeits, is as evident as that between the chaff and the wheat.’ Lowth.

V. 30. The false prophets borrowed, or stole, some of the phrases of the true prophets, and such other things as suited their purpose: and this served to give plausibility to the lying predictions, which they intermingled with them. (Notes, 33—40. xxviii. 2—4.)

V. 33—40. (Note, Is. xlii. 1.) The prophets frequently called their prophecies "Burdens," especially when they related to divine judgments: and probably their opposers ridiculed the expression. So that, by way of taunting them for delivering so many terrible predictions, they used deridingly to ask "What is the burden of the LORD?" (Notes, 1 Kings xxii. 8. Is. xxviii. 9—15. 17—22.) To this, Jeremiah was commanded to answer, "that the LORD would forsake them," and then their miseries would indeed be a heavy burden. He did not mean that God would finally forsake the nation; but that he would forsake those mockers, and that rebellious generation. And, if any of them still presumed to use that expression in derision any more, the Lord declared that he would severely "punish that man and his house." He therefore directed them what words to use in such cases, that they might not thus contemptuously use the language of the Holy Spirit. But, as they would pervert his words, who was "the living God, the LORD of Hosts their God;" he would make their own words fall on them, as a heavy burden, and execute the predicted judgments with unrelenting severity. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Ps. lxiv. 7—9. Prov. xviii. 6, 7. Matt. xii. 31—37. Jam. iii. 1—6.)—As we find some of the succeeding prophets use the same expression; it is plain that God did not mean to restrict his servants from reverently using the word, but his enemies from deriding it. (Zech. ix. 1.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

Every man must render an account to God of the talents committed to his stewardship; and "to whom much hath been given, of him will much be required." (Notes, Matt. xxv. 14—30. Luke xii. 47, 48. xvi. 1—13. P. O. —Notes, and P. O. xix. 1—27.) Men must also be answerable to God for the mischief which arises from their neglect of duty, as well as for their other crimes. Woe then be to those rulers, who abuse their authority to destroy and scatter their subjects! who oppress and plunder those, whom they are commissioned to protect! Or who suffer them to be enslaved, oppressed, slaughtered, or scattered, by private depredators, or foreign enemies, through their own ambition, avarice, luxury, or negligence! But still deeper guilt is contracted by the pastors of God's flock, the professed rulers and teachers of the church, who pervert their authority, neglect their work, are greedy of filthy lucre, or even persecute those whom they ought to tend and feed. (Notes, Is. lvi. 9—12. Ez. xxxiv. 2—6.) The true sheep of Christ, however, shall not be lost, through the negligence or wickedness of such pastors. Their great and good Shepherd, who is the LORD of Hosts, will gather them from every district of the earth into his fold; and there he will place over them able, faithful, diligent, and tender shepherds, to feed and tend them: and he himself will protect them by his power, and support them by his grace, from terror and dismay; and not one of them shall be wanting, when he shall come finally to separate between the sheep and the goats. (Notes, Matt. xxv. 31—46. John x. 26—31.)—For this "righteous Branch" has been raised up unto David, and now reigns, as Immanuel, on the mediatorial throne; to execute judgment on his enemies, and to save and defend his people: and in him, as "The LORD our Righteousness," all believers are "justified and glory;" of his Spirit they all partake, and are taught to love, to obey, and imitate him, in whom is all their salvation. "To him shall the gathering of the people be:" (Note, Gen. xlix. 10:) his redemption is far more glorious, than all former deliverances of his church: here the glory of God is peculiarly displayed, and it is our grand privilege to have such a Prophet, Priest, and King. May our souls be gathered to him, and “found in him;” and may Jews and Gentiles, and all the inhabitants of the earth become the willing, loyal, and devoted subjects of “The LORD our Righteousness!”

V. 9—32.

Whilst we rejoice in our privileges; if we be zealous for the glory of God, and full of compassion for our fellow sinners; we cannot but be deeply concerned when we consider the present state of mankind, and even that of the visible church. It might well fill us with consternation and amazement, and prompt us to such earnestness, in endeavouring to convince men of their guilt and misery, as would be despised by carnal men, and mistaken for inebriation or insanity, (Notes, Acts ii. 12, 13, v. 13. 2 Cor. v. 13—15,) to compare the words of God’s holiness in the sacred scriptures, with the doctrine and example of a very large majority of rulers and teachers in the church, and with the lives of most professed Christians. For it is evident, that they are awfully deceived, and deceiving each other, into a false peace; when the heavy wrath of God is ready to fall upon them.—Whilst, even in this favoured land, men seem ambitious to exceed the adulteries and lewdness of the reprobate Jews; there can be no doubt that a far heavier load of perjury rests upon us; which, being connected with the whole system of political government, and judicial and commercial transactions, and even ecclesiastical affairs, is in the strictest sense a national sin. “Because of swearing our land” ought to mourn in deep repentance: and if it do not, it may justly be apprehended, that ere long it will mourn under desolating judgments, which may turn all our “pleasant places into a wilderness.” Yet alas! the course, in which men in general proceed, is evil; and too often authority and influence give energy to natural depravity, to urge others on more forcibly in sin.—But are not many of our priests and prophets also ungodly? Does not the Lord find their wickedness in his house, and even at his table? And do not numbers thus provoke Him to give them up to the lusts of their own hearts, till they are driven headlong into destruction? Perhaps God more abhors those who profess to preach his truth, but pervert it by their lies, and disgrace it by their vices; than those who openly abet the cause of infidelity and irreligion. He sees it very horrible, when the wicked examples of the teachers combine with their soothing and plausible instructions, to embolden evil doers in their crimes, and to quiet the consciences of the impenitent and unbelieving; and though men may attempt to palliate these abominations; those who commit them are in the eyes of the Lord as vile as the inhabitants of Sodom, and it will be “less tolerable for them in the day of judgment.” For from such teachers “profaneness” or hypocrisy, or both, “go forth throughout the land:” the principles and morals of the people are poisoned at the fountain-head: and hence originate those torrents of infidelity, impiety, and profligacy, which overwhelm whole nations, and ripen them for destruction. Yet, those who will hearken to such teachers, as “speak from their own hearts, and not out of the mouth of the LORD,” and whose doctrine tends to render them vain and ungodly, must be answerable for it: for it is easy to distinguish them from those, who “stand in the counsel of the LORD,” and hear his word; especially as he has promised to give wisdom to those who lack it and pray for it. (Notes, Prov. ii. 1—6. Jam. i. 5—8, v. 5.)—It is plain that many run before they are sent by God; and that they only aim to obtain preferment or reputation, and not to bring sinners to repentance, to faith in Christ, and newness of life: and therefore they do not scruple to promise “peace to those who despise” the Lord, and “who walk after the imagination of their own hearts.” It is evident that this is the tendency and effect of much publick teaching: men destitute of the fear of God, and without conscientiousness in their general conduct, are emboldened by it to hope well of their state towards God, and even to count themselves interested in all the privileges of the gospel. Some of these teachers dream dreams of the deceit of their own hearts, and are continually inventing new refinements in infidelity or enthusiasm; which cause the people to forget the Lord, and his holy truths and precepts; to take a part of the Bible for the whole; to establish new creeds, or to separate doctrinal truths from their practical tendency. Some again retail other men’s inventions, and steal scraps of divinity from their neighbours, and preach, (without any judgment of their own,) what other men have compiled for them; thus indulging their own sloth, and covering over their own ignorance and incompetency, and gratifying the avarice of the compilers. Others gather a few notions and expressions from faithful ministers; and by additions, alterations, or perversions, enervate and corrupt them, and “cause the people to err by their lies and lightness.” But what is all this “chaff to the wheat, saith the LORD?” Cannot they be distinguished from each other? Let the word of God be faithfully and fully preached, and the difference will soon appear, in its nature, tendency, and effects: for “the word of God is quick and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword;” it comes to the heart and conscience with authority and conviction; it instructs and alarms; it breaks the hard, and humbles the proud heart: it leads to repentance, to faith, and holiness: it enlightens, quickens, purifies, and renews the soul: it is no smooth, lulling, soothing message; but resembles “the fire and the hammer that breaketh the rocks in pieces.” And by these emblems, this tendency, and these effects, and by the spirit and example of true ministers of Christ, the real word of God may be distinguished as certainly, from false doctrines taught by carnal preachers, as the wheat may be known from the worthless chaff.—No fair appearances, or pretences, can conceal the hypocrisy, ambition, avarice, or infidelity, of false professors or teachers, from the omnipresent, heart-searching Judge. He hears all their words, and sees their thoughts; he will “bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and manifest the counsels of their hearts:”

THE ^a LORD shewed me, and, behold, ^b two baskets of figs were set before the temple of the LORD, ^c after that Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon had carried away captive Jeconiah the son of Jehoiakim king of Judah, and the princes of Judah, with the carpenters ^d and smiths, from Jerusalem, and had brought them to Babylon.

^e 2 One ^e basket had very good figs, even like the figs that are first ripe: and the other basket had ^f very naughty figs, which could not be eaten, ^g they were so bad.

^h 3 Then said the LORD unto me, ⁱ What seest thou, Jeremiah? And I said, Figs; the good figs, very good, and the evil, very evil, that cannot be eaten, they are so evil.

⁴ ¶ Again the word of the LORD ⁿ came unto me, saying,

V. 33—40.

It is a mark of great and daring impiety for men to jest with the words of God, or to ridicule the expressive language of faithful ministers. The enmity of the carnal heart powerfully urges men, thus to “pervert the words of the living God:” they who expect impunity in sin, and despise or abuse the salvation of the gospel, are always prone to revile or deride those, who, in the most scriptural manner, preach to sinners their danger of eternal damnation: and numbers only enquire concerning the word of God, for their diversion, or to ridicule it. But every idle and profane word, will add to the sinner’s insupportable burden of wrath and misery, in the day when the Judge shall bid him “depart accursed into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels;” and when, being forsaken of God, everlasting shame and reproach will be his portion: and that which may seem in itself to men a light matter, will be found a most heinous act of desperate rebellion, when sinners, by persisting in it, set God himself at defiance; when God says, Thou shalt not; and the sinner’s words or actions answer, I will. Let us then so enquire after the word of the Lord, that we may believe, reverence, and obey it for our good.

V. 7. Many of the more pious Jews were carried away captive with Jeconiah, or before him; among whom were Daniel and his companions, and Ezekiel. (Notes, Ez. i. 1—3. Dan. i. 1—7.) The afflictions of the captives were suited to humble them, and to lead them to repentance; whilst those, who remained at Jerusalem, became more and more hardened in presumption and rebellion. But, whatever means were used, the power of divine grace effected the grand difference between them. The Lord promised to give the captives “a heart,” (a proper state of the judgment, will, and affections of soul,) to “know him,” in the glory of his perfections, and in his relations unto them: and this knowledge would induce them to renounce all idols and iniquities, and to return to his worship and service “with their whole heart.” (Notes, ix. 23, 24. 1 Chr. xxviii. 9. John xvii. 1—3.) Thus they would be acknowledged as his people, and he would be their God, their Portion, Protector, and Salvation: and he would take care of them, as a man would of the best and most valued produce of the fig-tree. Doubtless, a great reformation and revival of religion took place among the captives, and by them and their descendants the land was afterwards chiefly replenished: for those who remained in Judea, were in general destroyed, or driven into Egypt; whence few, if any, of them returned: (Notes, xliii. xlv:) or they were carried to distant regions, and detained in slavery.—But some expressions lead us to suppose, that the Spirit of prophecy looked forward to the present dispersion of the unbelieving Jews in all the nations of the earth, and to all

8 And ^a as the evil figs, which cannot be eaten, they are so evil; surely thus saith the LORD, 'So will I give Zedekiah the king of Judah, and his princes, and the residue of Jerusalem, that remain in this land, ^a and them that dwell in the land of Egypt.

CHAP. XXV.

A summary review of the messages sent by Jeremiah to the Jews, during twenty-three years; and a reproof of their contempt of them, 1—7. A prediction of the desolations of the land for seventy years;

the debasing circumstances attending it.—'To these first captives chiefly those blessings belong, which are promised to the Jews upon their return from captivity; such as were the knowledge and fear of God, and grace to live in obedience to his commandments. (xxx. 22. xxxi. 33. xxxii. 38, 39.) ... But I conceive the eminent completion of this prophecy will be at the time of the general restoration of that nation.' Lowth. (Notes, xxxii. 37—41. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The professors of true religion are presented before God, to be devoted to his glory, and employed in doing good to mankind; as the first fruits of the fig-tree were brought to the temple, to be consecrated to God, and used by the priests and Levites. Indeed none of the human race are so good and useful as true believers; and none are so vile and worthless as hypocrites: thus "the good are very good, and the bad very bad," more than among other men. (Notes, Ez. xv. Matt. v. 13—16.) But the Lord often spares those longest, and exempts them most from present suffering, whom he has "appointed unto wrath." As many as he loves, he rebukes and chastens: "and when the loss of estates, liberty, and country, and a complication of hardships and calamities, are sanctified to the saving of their souls; these appear to be the methods by which God acknowledges his choice of them, and his purpose of doing them good.—He alone can remove the pride, enmity, and blindness of the carnal mind, and give men hearts to know, fear, love, and trust him: when this change takes place, they cordially return to him in his appointed way. (Note, Ez. xi. 17—20.) Thus they become accepted, obedient servants and worshippers; and he becomes their God and Father. Thenceforth he will com-

after which the Chaldean empire would be subverted, 8—14. A prediction of the devastation of the surrounding kingdoms; under the figures of an intoxicating cup, a destroying sword, a lion wasting a sheepfold, and the howlings of the shepherds, 15—38.

fort them under all their trials, deliver them from every enemy, and set his eyes upon them for good, and that for ever.—Let those who desire these blessings, beg of God to "give them a heart to know him;" and let parents importunately urge the same prayer for their children, ministers for their people, and every man for his relations, friends, and neighbours. Let us also remember, that it is in this way, the Lord preserves a church on earth; whilst multitudes of professed Christians, without respect of rank or external distinction, are given up to complicated contempt and misery, for a warning to others not to copy their crimes, or to presume upon their own privileges: and this consideration should direct our prayers, and encourage our hopes, respecting a final prevalence of the gospel throughout the earth.

But Daniel, ii. 1, writing in Chaldee, follows the computation in use among the Chaldeans.' Lowth.—The computation here used fixes the beginning of Nebuchadnezzar's reign two years later; namely, from the time in which he began to reign alone. (Notes, xlii. 1—11. Hos. 2, 3.) PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14.

The command to repent, and turn from every evil way to the worship and service of God, and the invitations to sinners to come and trust in Christ, and partake of his salvation, concern all men, and ought to be fully and plainly proposed to all. (Note, Acts xvii. 30, 31. P. O. 10—34. Note, 1 Tim. i. 15, 16.) It is agreed by the servants of God, in every age and under every dispensation, that he will do no hurt to those, however wicked they have been, who truly obey this command, and accede to this invitation; that no good can come to those, who provoke him by impenitent wickedness; and that no profession, or creed, or forms, can profit those, who "do not turn from the evil of their doings."—The Lord keeps an exact register of our sins, and the aggravations of them, and of our abused mercies and means of grace; and thus the continued neglect shewn to the warnings of his faithful ministers exceedingly hastens the execution of his judgments.—The earnestness with which the zealous servants of God labour, and the fervency with which they pray, for the salvation of souls, afford a striking contrast to the sloppiness and negligence of most men about their own salvation!—Our God is sincere in all his invitations, and faithful to all his promises; he "rejoiceth in mercy," and "delighteth not in the death of the wicked."—How soon will they, who refuse to seek happiness in his favour, be deprived of every source of transient joy! All miseries of earth, however, are temporal, and have an appointed period; but "the wrath to come" is perpetual, yea, eternal.—The Lord employs wicked men as his servants, and when they have executed his vengeance on others, to gratify their own hateful passions, he punishes them for their wickedness. And every threatening of scripture will be as certainly accomplished, as those have been, which relate to Jerusalem and Babylon.

How grand and awful a view have we here given us of divine Providence! How affecting a representation of the state of fallen man! The judgments of God have ever been going round from one nation to another, and have never been suffered to rest; because of the wickedness of mankind.—When we consider the fury and rage, with which the several nations of the earth have, in every age, rushed upon mutual carnage and destruction; we must allow that their conduct has resembled that of men, who are intoxicated and mad: but we need not wonder at these effects, when we reflect that they have been drinking of the cup of God's indignation, and have been given up to their own mad passions to execute his vengeance on each other. This emblem also may instruct us, what an odious and pernicious vice drunkenness is: and how dreadful the wrath of God must be to those who fall under it to rise no more. It is vain to struggle against the sentence which he has denounced, or to object to his righteousness: he will constrain men to drink of this bitter cup; he will destroy them with his avenging sword. He will not even spare those cities or countries, which have been called by his name: but if his judgments begin with degenerate professors of Christianity, let not the impious and profligate expect to be "altogether unpunished;" for "from his holy habitation he will utter his voice against all flesh." He has just ground of controversy with every nation, and every individual, and he will plead against them, and "execute judgment on all the wicked." Thus evil goes from nation to nation: no tongue can express the miseries which have been endured, or the multitudes which have perished, by means of the great scourges of the world; who successively have been raised up, run their course, and then been destroyed. We have abundant cause to be thankful, that our's are yet "peaceable habitations;" but many, which were so for a time, have been "cut down, because of the fierce anger of the LORD." When he leaves his place to execute judgment, or withdraws his protection from offending nations; the days of slaughter arrive, and lands are soon left desolate, or groaning under the iron rod of oppression: and then the chief in rank and authority are most exposed to peril and suffering; and are generally the least able to escape, or to endure hardship.—But the Lord will preserve his people in all changes: and whatever removes them from this world of sin and sorrow, they will then enter into those peaceful mansions, where war, changes, sickness, and death, can find no admission; because no sin will be found in them for ever. (Note, Is. lvii. 1, 2.)

CHAP. XXVI.

Jeremiah delivers an awful message from God at the temple, and is persecuted by the priests and prophets, 1—9. He pleads his cause before the princes, exhorts them to repent, and warns them not to shed innocent blood, 10—15. The princes acquit him, referring to the example of Micah, 16—19. Urijah, having prophesied in like manner, was persecuted; and having fled into Egypt, was fetched thence by Jehoiakim and slain, 20—23. But Ahikam protects Jeremiah, 24.

IN ^a the beginning of the reign of Jehoiakim, the son of Josiah, king of Judah, came this word from the LORD, saying,

2 Thus saith the LORD; ^b Stand in the court of the LORD's house, and speak unto all the cities of Judah, which come to worship in the LORD's house, ^c all the words that I command thee to speak unto them; ^d diminish not a word:

5 To hearken to the words of ⁱ my servants the prophets, ^k whom I sent unto you, both rising up early, and sending them, but ye have not hearkened;

7 So ⁿ the priests, and the prophets, and all the people heard Jeremiah speaking these words in the house of the LORD.

8 Now it came to pass, when Jeremiah had made an end of speaking all that the LORD had commanded him to speak unto all the people, That ^o the priests and the prophets, and all the people, took him, saying, Thou shalt surely die.

9 ^p Why hast thou prophesied in the name of the LORD, saying, this house shall be like Shiloh, and this city shall be desolate without an inhabitant? ^q And all the people were gathered against Jeremiah ^r in the house of the LORD.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXVI. V. 1. 'The preceding chapter is dated in the fourth year of Jehoiakim: (Note, xxv. 1:) this in the beginning of his reign. It seems therefore most natural to suppose, that this was delivered first. Yet some think it followed immediately after. (Notes, xxxvi. 1—10.)

V. 2. 'The great court was the place, where both men and women did ordinarily worship when they brought no sacrifice: ... for when they offered a sacrifice, they were to bring it into the inner court, ... or that of the priests.' Lightfoot in Lowth. (Notes, Ex. xxvii. 9—19. 1 Kings vi. 36.)—This prophecy being delivered in the courts of the temple, on a publick occasion, probably on one of the three great annual festivals, before the priests and false prophets as well as the people, was likely to exasperate the minds of the hardened offenders, especially of those in authority and reputation: (Notes, vii. 1, 2. xx. 1—6. Matt. xxi. 23—27. Acts v. 17—25:) and therefore the prophet was expressly commanded not to diminish a word from it; as he might have been tempted to do, especially since Urijah had been put to death for his faithfulness, probably just before. (Note, 20—23.)

Diminish. 'Either out of fear, favour, or flattery.' Lowth. (Notes, Deut. iv. 2. Acts xx. 18—21, v. 20. 25—27, v. 27. Rev. xxii. 18—21.)

V. 3—6. Marg. Ref.—Notes, vii. 3—15. xviii. 7—12. xxv. 3—7. xxxvi. 1—3, v. 3. 1 Sam. iv. 10—24. Ps. lxxviii.

56—64.—A curse. (6) 'So that when they would curse any, they shall say, God do to thee, as to Jerusalem.' (Marg. Ref. m.—Notes, xxix. 21—23. Is. lxxv. 13—15.)

V. 7, 8. Marg. Ref.—Prophets. (7) False prophets. Sept. Perhaps some of these prophets had been trained up in the schools of the prophets; but there is no proof, and little probability, that they all were, as some expositors conclude; or that so very large a proportion from those seminaries became false prophets, the deceivers and ruin of the nation. (Notes, 1 Sam. x. 5, 6. 1 Kings xviii. 4. xix. 20, 21. 2 Kings ii. 3. iv. 1.)—Die. (8) 'As a disturber of the government, and a discourager of the people from defending their country.' Lowth. (Notes, 16—19. xx. 1—6. xxxviii. 1—6. Acts v. 27, 28. 33—39.)

V. 9. The priests and false prophets, who were the prosecutors of Jeremiah, seem to have utterly disregarded what he had spoken concerning repentance and turning from their evil ways; and merely to have noticed the prophecy against the city and temple, in case they did not repent, as if it had been absolute: and thus they in effect bare false witness against him. They doubtless professed to be zealous for the temple and their religious establishment; while they chiefly regarded their own reputation authority, and emoluments. But though they were hypocrites in religion, and profligate in morals; yet, (like the scribes and Pharisees in the time of Christ,) they had acquired such ascendancy over the minds of the people, that these were ready to leave their devotions to join with them

10 ¶ When * the princes of Judah heard these things, then they came up from the king's house unto the house of the LORD, and sat down * in the entry of ^t the new gate of the LORD's house.

11 Then spake the priests and the prophets unto the princes and to all the people, ^u saying, ^t This man is worthy to die: ^x for he hath prophesied against this city, as ye have heard with your ears.

12 Then spake Jeremiah unto all the princes, and to all the people, saying, ^y The LORD sent me to prophesy against this house, and against this city, all the words that ye have heard.

13 Therefore now ^z amend your ways and your doings; and obey the voice of the LORD your God; and the LORD will ^a repent him of the evil that he hath pronounced against you.

14 ^b As for me, behold, I am in your hand: do with me ^t as seemeth good and meet unto you.

15 But know ye for certain, that if ye put me to death, ^c ye shall surely bring innocent blood upon yourselves, and upon this city, and upon the inhabitants thereof: ^d for of a truth the LORD hath sent me unto you, to speak all these words in your ears.

16 Then said ^e the princes and all the people unto the priests, and to the prophets, This man is not worthy to die: for he hath spoken to us in the name of the LORD our God.

17 Then rose up certain of the elders of the land, and spake to all the assembly of the people, saying,

18 ^f Micah the Morasthite prophesied in the days of Hezekiah king of Judah, and spake to all the people of Judah, saying, Thus saith the LORD of hosts: ^g Zion shall be plowed like a field, and ^h Jerusalem shall become heaps, and ⁱ the mountain of the house as the high places of a forest.

19 Did Hezekiah king of Judah, and all Judah put him at all to death? ^j did he not fear the LORD, and besought ^k the LORD, and ^l the LORD repented him of the evil which he had pronounced against them? ^m Thus might we procure great evil against our souls.

in putting the prophet to death, for saying no more, than Moses in the law, and all the preceding prophets, had said before him! (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 16—19. Matt. xxvi. 57—62, vv. 61, 62. Acts xxi. 27—30.)

V. 10. Princes.] As these princes are distinguished from the priests, the chief of whom formed a part of the Sanhedrim, that court cannot be meant, as expositors generally suppose; but the persons highest in rank and authority under the king. (Notes, xxxvi. 11—19. xxxviii. 1—6. 24—28.)—New gate.] ‘So called because it had been repaired by Jotham. 2 Kings xv. 35.’ Lowth.

V. 11. Worthy, &c.] ‘The judgment of death is for this man.’ Marg. ‘We require that the sentence of death be executed upon him.’—This greatly resembled the conduct of the scribes, priests, and elders, who demanded of Pilate that Jesus should be put to death: (Notes, Matt. xxvii. 1, 2. Luke xxiii. 1—5. John xviii. 28—32;) and the charge brought against Jeremiah was exactly the same, as that brought against the first martyr St. Stephen. (Note, Acts vi. 9—14.)

V. 12—15. The calm intrepidity, the disinterested faithfulness, and “the meekness of wisdom,” manifested in the prophet’s answer, in such trying circumstances, are peculiarly admirable. Conscious that he had spoken nothing, but what God had commanded him to speak; he seems to have been very little solicitous concerning the event as to himself: but his disinterested love to his ungrateful people, was united with fervent zeal for the honour of God, in leading him to seize the opportunity of once more, in the most solemn and pathetick manner, exhorting them to repentance; (Note, 3—6;) and of warning them not to add, to all their other personal and national transgressions, the guilt of “innocent blood;” with this peculiar aggravation, that it would be the blood of a prophet, shed for faithfully obeying the command of God. (Notes, ii. 33—37. 2 Kings xxiv. 3, 4. Matt. xxiii. 34—39. Acts iv. 13—22, vv. 19, 20. v. 29—31. vii. 51—60.)

V. 16—19. Some expositors consider the remainder of this chapter, as the debate which took place in the Sanhedrim, on the case of Jeremiah: but since the people were present, and no mention is made of the council, but merely of the princes and “certain of the elders;” probably what is here recorded took place in the court of the temple. ‘The Sanhedrim (17), or at least some considerable men among them. Comp. 21. xxxvi. 12. xxxvii. 15. xxxviii. 4. ...The people who before were forward to condemn him; now, upon hearing his apology, were as ready to acquit him.’ Lowth. They before united with the priests and prophets; (Note, 9;) but now some of them concurred with the princes; who refused to pronounce the sentence of death against Jeremiah (24). “Not against this man the judgment of death.” (Note, 11.)—It does not appear, whether “the elders of the land” were some of the princes before mentioned; or some other eminent persons, who adduced very appositely the example of Micah, and quoted his words in support of their determination, and against the rash judgment of the priests and prophets. (Note, Mic. iii. 8—12.)—There is no satisfactory ground in the following history, to conclude, that either these princes or elders, in general, so attended to the message of God, as to repent of their sins, or to attempt a publick reformation; though they seem at this time to have had transient convictions, which the Lord made use of for his servant's preservation.—Against our souls. (19) *Marg. V. 20—23. 'This seems to be an instance, alledged by 'others of the Sanhedrim, in favour of the priests and 'prophets, who were for condemning Jeremiah.' Lowth. (Note, 10. 16—19.)—If the narrative was added by the sacred writer, as it probably was, he meant to magnify the power and goodness of God in preserving him against the persecuting rage of Jehoiakim, as well as that of the priests and prophets. Urijah seems to have been faithful in delivering his message: but he was faulty in relinquishing his work, and fleeing into Egypt for fear of Jehoiakim; as if he dared not to stand to what he had said. (Note, 1 Kings xix. 3, 4.) Jehoiakim, being at that time in alliance with the king of Egypt, was permitted to fetch Urijah thence; and he directly slew him. By burying Urijah "in the graves of the common people," he intended to render him and his prediction contemptible among his subjects: but his own dead body was treated with far deeper indignity. (Notes, xxii. 13—19. Is. liii. 9, 10. John xviii. 38—42.)—Had the king and people imitated Hezekiah, the Lord would have averted the threatened judgments, as he had done in that pious prince's time: nor would Nebuchadnezzar have been able to take the city, any more than Sennacherib had been. But God foresaw, that both rulers and people would bring destruction on themselves, by impenitence; and by murdering his prophets.

V. 24. 'Which declareth that nothing could have appeased their fury, if God had not moved this nobleman to 'stand valiantly in his defence.'—'This Ahikam was the 'father of Gedaliah, who was afterwards made governor of 'the land under the Chaldeans, (2 Kings xxv. 22,) and the 'son of Shaphan the scribe, who was chief minister of state 'under Josiah, (2 Kings xxii. 8—14,) and brother to Gemariah, (xxxvi. 10,) Elasah, (xxix. 3,) and Jaazaniah, (Ez. viii. 11;) who were great men in those days.' Prideaux. Ahikam was employed by Josiah in his reformation, so that his influence must have been very great. (2 Kings xxii. 12. 14.)—Gedaliah appears to have been a man of good character. (Notes, xxxix. 11—14. xl. 4—16. xli.)

So that it is not improbable, that Ahikam was a pious man: though, except on this occasion, he did not boldly espouse the cause of the prophet. (Marg. Ref. t.)

People.] (Notes, 9. 16—19.) It seems that the bulk of the people were still enraged against the prophet.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

The ambassadors of God should speak his word with all boldness, and adhere strictly to their instructions: but in so doing they will often be exposed to danger, and to the censure even of their more timid and less zealous friends.—A minister of religion, who diminishes aught from the message, which he is sent to deliver, is as justly chargeable with unfaithfulness, as he who alters any thing in it: ministers should therefore be very diligent in obtaining an acquaintance with the whole revealed counsel of God, as well as careful to declare it without respect of persons.—It must not be expected, that the Lord will abate any thing of what he requires, or alter his method of delivering sinners from deserved punishment, in compliance with the perverse desires of his rebellious subjects. It is his invariable rule, to pour contempt on all external distinctions and performances when men rest in them and neglect "the power of godliness:" and indeed the most implacable enemies to true religion have often been most zealous for forms and notions; especially when their interests and characters were concerned. It has therefore sometimes been safer, to denounce the judgments of God against wicked princes, and even in the palaces of kings, (Notes, xxii,) than in the precincts of the temple, and before hypocritical priests and prophets; who have in every age been ready to enquire of those, whom the Lord has employed as his messengers, "By whose authority" do ye such things? and to pronounce them worthy to die for doing his will. They have also frequently seduced the people into such an unaccountable reverence for them; that they have been ready to concur in their persecuting designs, without further enquiry. (Note, v. 30, 31.)

V. 10—24.

It is evidently desirable, that, in every nation, the power of decision, in all criminal causes, should finally be vested in the civil government: for even where princes are irreligious, they are not influenced by so many personal mo-

CHAP. XXVII.

Jeremiah is directed to make yokes and bonds; to wear them on his own neck, and to send them to several kings by their ambassadors; with a command to each of them from the Creator of the world, to submit to the king of Babylon, if they would escape destruction, 1—11. He counsels Zedekiah to the same effect; warns him and the people against false prophets; and predicts further desolations, 12—22.

IN ^a the beginning of the reign of Jehoiakim the son of Josiah king of Judah, came this word unto Jeremiah from the LORD, saying, tives or resentments, as profligate ecclesiasticks are; and more justice may be expected even from Pilate, than from Caiaphas. But how shameful is it, when those who bear the sacred character, stand forward to persecute the servants of God, and wrest their words in testifying against them! and when after all, the magistrates shew, that they have done no evil; nay, justify their conduct from the examples and precepts of scripture!—It behoves those, who are most earnest in the cause of God, to be proportionably calm and resigned in their own concerns: it suffices to shew, that they act in obedience to him, and confide in his protection: and it is very proper that they should express more regard for the good of their prosecutors, than for their own personal safety; taking the opportunity of meekly warning them not to add the guilt of murder or oppression to their other sins, but “to amend their lives, that it may be well with them:” as all men may know for certain, that injuring faithful reprovers will hasten and increase the punishments of individuals and communities.—Of what great importance is it to be well versed in the historical part of scripture: for apposite references may be made to it on almost every occasion, and directions deduced from it to regulate our conduct.—It may seem a light matter to conclude, that they are “not worthy to be put to death, who have spoken the word of the LORD:” yet they must think themselves greatly favoured, who are thus protected, though they have no other recompence from man. For many, whose consciences testify to the character of the faithful minister, and to the truth of his words; and who will occasionally countenance him, from conviction or personal respect, will not obey the commands of God delivered by him, but go on in sin to their own destruction.—No enmity is more implacable, than that excited by faithful reproof; or more dangerous, when the proud transgressor has power to gratify it: but none can go further than the Lord is pleased to permit; and they, who are employed in his service, and abide in their proper work and place, have no reason to fear man.—Extraordinary cases call for extraordinary firmness: but though the servants of God agree in the substance of their ministry, they do not all possess equal constancy and intrepidity; nor do the same persons at all times. The persecuted minister may change the scene of his labours, and thus flee from one city to another: (Notes, Acts xiv. 5—7. Thes. ii. 1—8:) but he must not run away from his work, or shelter himself from danger, in those places,

NOTES.

CHAP. XXVII. V. 1. Jehoiakim.] As Zedekiah is afterwards mentioned through this whole transaction, it seems to have been by an error of some early transcriber, that the name of Jehoiakim is here substituted. Indeed some interpreters suppose, that the prophet had the vision in the reign of Jehoiakim; but was not ordered to make the yokes and bonds according to it, till the reign of Zedekiah. ‘In the beginning of the reign of Jehoiakim, ... the word of the Lord came to Jeremiah, to be afterward executed in the reign of Zedekiah.’ Bp. Hall.—The former, however, seems the most natural supposition: and in a very few instances it is absolutely necessary to have recourse to this method of solving difficulties. (Comp. Zech. xi. 12, 13. Matt. xxvii. 9.)—‘Such little verbal mistakes must be allowed by all impartial readers, to have sometimes happened in transcribing the scriptures, as well as in other books; and may easily be corrected, by comparing the suspected reading with other parts of the sacred text, which admit of no difficulty or uncertainty.’ Lowth.—The Septuagint does not contain this first verse.

V. 2, 3. The kings of the nations here mentioned seem to have entered into an alliance, against the growing power of Nebuchadnezzar, and to have sent ambassadors to Zedekiah, to induce him to accede to the treaty. But as it had been before repeatedly predicted, that they should be subjugated by the king of Babylon, this was a vain attempt to frustrate the purpose of God. (Notes, xxv. 15—26.) Jeremiah was therefore ordered to make “yokes,” of wood, like those which were put on the oxen; and “bonds,” such as were used to fasten them: and, wearing one of each on his own neck, to excite their attention, he was directed to send one to each of the confederating kings, with the following message, by the ambassadors. (Marg. Ref. b, c.—Notes, xiii. 1—11. Is. xx. 2—6. Ez. iv. v.) whatever opposition might be made, possess the full dominion of all these countries: but that when the appointed time was expired, (xxv. 12,) these haughty conquerors and cruel oppressors would, in their turn, become the prey of other powerful conquerors and oppressors. (Notes, Ezra i. 1—4. Is. xiv. 21—23.)—This prophecy would, no doubt, be made known, in some degree, among the principal persons in the adjacent countries: and, though for the present neglected, when it received its exact accomplishment, it must have been a very conclusive proof, that the God of Israel was the only true God, and the Sovereign of the whole earth, and “that he did according to his will in the army of heaven and among the inhabitants of the earth; and none could stay his hand, or say to him, ‘What doest thou?’”

V. 10, 11. The removal, dispersion, and ruin of each nation, would be the effect of the divinations of these false prophets and sorcerers, if they attended to them. Nothing but unreserved submission to Nebuchadnezzar could prevent the complicated miseries and dire effects of the unsuccessful war, and the hard bondage which awaited the vanquished. ‘They that...willingly submit themselves to him, shall continue in their own country and possessions, being only tributaries to the king of Babylon.’ xxxviii. 17. xlii. 10, 11. Lowth.

V. 12. (Notes, 1. xxxviii. 1—6. 17—23.) ‘What thⁱ prophet saith here to Zedekiah hath a particular weight iⁿ it; because he was made king...by Nebuchadnezzar, and took an oath of being faithful to him, and never resistin^g his authority.’ Lowth. (Notes, 2 Kings xxiv. 20. 2 Chr xxxvi. 13. Ez. xvii. 15—21. xxi. 25—27.)

V. 13—15. (Marg. Ref.—Note, 4—9.) The false prophets of the Jews are here joined to the diviners and so-

‘world; and by virtue of his absolute Sovereignty and dominion, has a right to give the kingdoms of the earth to whomsoever he pleases: (Dan. iv. 17:) and he exercises this authority, by “changing times and seasons,” by “removing kings and setting up kings.” (Dan. ii. 21.) It is the business of human laws to establish every government in that method, wherein it is already settled: but as this is no bar to Providence, which still has a right to alter governments, and, for great and wise reasons, often changes the scene of worldly affairs; so neither ought it to be an objection against submitting to any persons, whom God’s providence hath placed over us, and put into their hands the full power of exercising all those acts of government in which sovereignty consists. But although the people are bound in such cases to obey; yet this does not lessen the guilt of usurpers. xxv. 12.’ Lowth.—There was a peculiar grandeur, as well as propriety, in this method of predicting Nebuchadnezzar’s rapid successes.—The God of Israel, declaring himself to be the Lord of all armies, and the Creator and owner of the whole earth, with all its inhabitants and productions, and claiming full sovereignty over all his creatures; avows his determination, (for reasons which he does not deign to assign,) to give all the countries in that part of the world to the king of Babylon, whom he calls “his servant,” because he would accomplish an important part of his most righteous designs. (Notes, xxv. 8—14. Dan. iv. 10—26. v. 18—24.) They therefore, who would escape the most dreadful judgments, must submit to the God of Israel, by submitting to Nebuchadnezzar; they must hearken to, (believe and obey,) the prophets of Israel, and not to their own diviners and enchanters; (Marg. Ref. r;) and they must observe that Nebuchadnezzar, and his son, and grandson, would,

(Notes, xxiii. 13—15. 30.)—It is clearly intimated, that the people were about to be left to be deceived by the false prophets, that they might fall into deserved calamities: as Ahab had been deceived, to his ruin, by a lying spirit in the mouth of all his prophets. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The ministers of religion should always take the lead in every kind of self-denial or self-abasement, which they inculcate on others; and they will be supported under every hardship, which they meet with in the path of duty.—Opposition to the growing power and despotick rule of earthly conquerors and tyrants, should always be conducted in submission to the authority of God, and with every means of obtaining his peace and favour: for the most powerful confederacies will be broken, which are cemented by impiety and rebellion against him.—The whole earth is the property, as well as the work, of its omnipotent Creator; and “he giveth it to whomsoever it seemeth meet to “him:” but the character of those, who have hitherto had the largest share of its power and riches allotted to them, teaches us how very worthless he deems such acquisitions, compared with spiritual blessings.—The Lord does not now expressly inform us, whom he has appointed to rule the nations: and therefore the efforts of men to defend their liberties from usurpers or invaders, are not indiscriminately to be condemned. But when his will is made known by the event, it behoves us in our private capacity to consider “the powers that be, as ordained of God;” and to submit to them according to the laws and constitution of our country; without respect to their characters or conduct, for which they must render an account to their own Master. (Notes, Rom. xiii. 1—8.)—As every comfort or calamity is at the disposal of God; it must in all cases be our interest to obey his will, by what means soever it is made known: and those who will not believe this, must be convinced of it by the event; and of the fallacy of all the reasonings and devices, by which they were encouraged to seek happiness, in following their own inclinations. But if all men are bound to obey God, as far as they are able in any way to discover his will: how inexcusable are they who live at the fountain-head of instruction, and have repeated warnings, exhortations, and encouragements sent to them, and yet persist in rebellion! They may be said to be in love with death, and bent on their own destruction: (Notes, Prov. viii. 36. Ez. xviii. 30—32:) and those who encourage them to expect impunity, by contradicting the word of God and “speaking lies in his name,” are more criminal than the diviners and sorcerers of the Gentiles, and will be answerable for all the souls which perish by their means. But time-servers, who accommodate their instructions to the inclinations and wishes of men, especially of those in affluence or authority, are too generally more acceptable to the great, than the faithful ministers of Christ. Yet, whilst they promise the impenitent and unbelieving increasing prosperity, they have no power or interest in heaven, by which they may avert the most dreadful calamities: (Note, Mal. i. 9—11;) and it will be too late to remedy the mischief, when the event has proved them deceivers.—But if it be better to submit to those whom Providence places over us, and to live in peace, and to eat the bread of honesty by labour, than to seek great things by turbulence, and hazarding the loss of life or property; how good must it be to submit to Christ, “whose yoke is easy and whose burden is light, that we may find rest to our souls!” (Note, Matt. xi. 28—30.) For all, who refuse this subjection and neglect his salvation, must be finally and eternally miserable; notwithstanding all their own presumptuous hopes, and the delusions of those, who confidently promise them safety in unbelief and disobedience.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXVIII. V. 1. (Marg. Ref.) ‘This plainly refers to the time specified, at the beginning of the last chapter, and confirms the conjecture there made, that Jehoiakim is put there, by a mistake of the copies, for Zedekiah.’ Lowth. (Note, xxvii. 1.)—In the beginning, &c.] In the former part of his reign, after he had been king about three years and five months.

V. 2—4. This false prophet imitated the style and manner of the true prophets: but he unconditionally promised prosperity to an abandoned generation; and did not so much as exhort them to repentance or reformation. (Notes, 8, 9. xxiii. 13—17. xxvi. 12—15.) It was just such a message, as some men call pure gospel; all encouragement, promise, and privilege; without warning, discrimination of character, exhortation, or precept.

Jeconiah. (4) ‘This was grateful news to the people, who looked upon Zedekiah only as Nebuchadnezzar’s ‘deputy.’ Lowth.—Hananiah seems to have been more desirous of popular than regal favour: for this prediction could not be altogether agreeable to Zedekiah. But he evidently was a weak, as well as a wicked prince, and was very generally despised. (Notes, xxxviii. 1—6. 24—28.)

V. 5, 6. Amen, &c.] (Marg. Ref. j.) The prophet thus expressed his fervent love to his people. He would rejoice, if the predicted miseries should be averted, though he might incur the disgrace of being deemed a false prophet: (Notes, Jon. iv. 1—4. 2 Cor. xiii. 7—10;) and if his prayers could have prevailed, this would have been the case: but though he prayed for the people, he must prophesy against them, whilst they continued in their sins. (Notes, xv. 15—18. 1 Kings xxii. 13—17.)

V. 8, 9. All the prophets, whom God had raised up in Israel, had predicted great calamities to guilty nations, which had either come upon them, or been averted by repentance. So that they, who at this time opposed Jeremiah, would have opposed all who preceded him, for the same reasons. But it had not been common for prophets phesied both against many countries, and against great kingdoms, of war, and of evil, and of pestilence.

9 The prophet ^m which prophesieth of peace, when the word of the prophet shall come to pass, ⁿ then shall the prophet be known that the LORD hath truly sent him.

11 And Hananiah spake in the presence of all the people, saying, ^p Thus saith the LORD; ^q Even so will I break the yoke of Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon from the neck of all nations, within the space of two full years. And the prophet Jeremiah went his way.

12 Then ^r the word of the LORD came unto Jeremiah the prophet, after that Hananiah the prophet had broken the yoke from off the neck of the prophet Jeremiah, saying,

13 Go, and tell Hananiah, saying, Thus saith the LORD; ^s 'Thou hast broken the yokes of wood; but thou shalt make for them yokes of iron.

14 For thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; ^t 'I have put a yoke of iron upon the neck of all these nations, ^u that they may serve Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, and they shall serve him: ^x and I have given him the beasts of the field also.

15 ¶ Then said the prophet Jeremiah unto Hananiah the prophet, Hear now, Hananiah; ^y 'The LORD hath not sent thee, but thou makest this people to trust in a lie.

16 Therefore thus saith the LORD; Behold, ^z 'I will cast thee from off the face of the earth: ^a 'this year thou shalt die, ^b because thou hast taught ^{*} rebellion against the LORD.

17 So ^c Hananiah the prophet died the same year, in the seventh month.

to be sent, merely to assure the people of peace: and it was altogether unprecedented, for a true prophet to promise deliverance to a guilty nation, without calling the people to repentance. (Notes, xiv. 13-16. xxiii. 13-17. Is. xxx. 8-11. Mic. iii. 5-7.) The event must therefore shew whether Jeremiah, or his opponent, was sent of God: for one of them must be a false prophet, as their predictions flatly contradicted each other.—Jeremiah offers 'two reasons; ... first, Many other prophets agreed with 'him in prophesying evil against the Jews; ... such as 'Hosea, Joel, Amos, Isaiah, Micah, Habakkuk, Zephaniah: whereas Hananiah being single in his prophecy, 'nothing but the punctual answering the event, could give 'him the authority of a true prophet. ... Secondly, That 'considering the general corruption of the people's manners 'it was so much the more likely God should inflict severe 'judgments upon them.' Lowth.

V. 10, 11. (Note, xxvii. 2, 3.) Jeremiah continued to wear the yoke before all the people, in order the more forcibly to impress their minds, with the certainty of the events signified by this emblem. But Hananiah violently took the yoke from him, and brake it, to give the greater credit to his own confident and repeated prediction. (Notes, 1 Kings xxii. 11. 24, 25.)—And as the prophet had no message to deliver on this occasion, he would not enter into any further altercation with so violent a man; but waited till God directed him what to say and do.

V. 13, 14. Yokes of iron would be more galling, as well as far stronger, than yokes of wood; which implied that every effort of the nations, to resist the power of Nebuchadnezzar, would render their bondage more rigorous: and as Hananiah's prophecies tended to encourage this unavailing resistance, it is said, "Thou shalt 'make them yokes of iron." (Notes, xxv. 27-29. xxvii. 2-11.)

V. 15, 16. (Notes, xxvii. 12-22.) Hananiah's false prophecy encouraged the people, not only in other crimes, but also in refusing subjection to the Chaldeans, which God expressly commanded. (Notes, xx. 1-6. xxix. 21-32. 1 Kings xxii. 24, 25. Am. vii. 14-17. Acts xiii. 6-12.)

V. 17. Seventh.] Two months after Hananiah had delivered his false prophecy, which he declared, in the name of God, would be fulfilled in two years. (Notes, 1-4.)—'Seeing this thing was evident in the eyes of the 'people, and yet they returned not to the LORD; it is 'manifest, that miracles cannot move us, neither the word 'itself, except God touch the heart.'

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

No true prophet ever delivered his message with greater confidence, than false prophets have expressed when speaking lies in the name of God: and yet many well-meaning people are apt to regard men the more for being very confident, as if this were an evidence that they were in the right. But that which renders false teachers acceptable to multitudes, evidently distinguishes them from the faithful servants of God; namely the coincidence of their doctrine with the pride and self-flattery of the human heart; and its tendency to encourage impenitent sinners with the hopes of impunity, and prosperity, and eternal salvation. This so flatly contradicts the whole tenour of scripture, that none, who are acquainted with it and reverence it, can be deluded by them.—Those ministers, who are most full of love and compassion for sinners, and who most fervently seek and pray for their salvation, will be the most determined not to flatter their pride, or soothe their consciences with delusive hopes. They will most plainly declare the alarming, as well as the encouraging parts of the sacred oracles; and call men to repentance, faith, and holiness,

CHAP. XXIX.

Jeremiah, by letter, requires the captives at Babylon, to accommodate themselves to their condition; and not to believe the false prophets, who assured them of a speedy deliverance, 1—9. He promises them in the name of God, a gracious restoration at the end of seventy years, 10—14. He foretels the destruction of those who remained at Jerusalem, 15—19; and shews the dreadful end of two false prophets at Babylon, 20—23. Shemaiah writes a letter from Babylon, against Jeremiah, 24—29; by whom Shemaiah's doom is foretold, 30—32.

NOW these are the words ^a of the letter, that Jeremiah the prophet sent from Jerusalem unto the residue of ^b the elders which were carried away captives, and to the priests, and to the prophets, and to all the people, whom Nebuchadnezzar had carried away captive from Jerusalem to Babylon, 2 (After that ^c Jeconiah the king, and the queen, and the ^d eunuchs, the princes of Judah and Jerusalem, and the carpenters, and the smiths, were departed from Jerusalem,)

3 By the hand of Elasah the son of ^d Shaphan, and ^e Gemariah the son of Hilkiyah, (whom Zedekiah king of Judah sent unto Babylon to Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon,) saying,

4 Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel, unto all that are carried away captives, ^f whom I have caused to be carried away from Jerusalem unto Babylon;

5 ^g Build ye houses, and dwell in ^g them; and plant gardens, and eat the fruit of them.

6 ^h Take ye wives, and beget sons and daughters; and ⁱ take wives for your sons, and give your daughters to husbands, that they may bear sons and daughters, that ye may be increased there, and not diminished.

7 And ^j seek the peace of the city, ^j whither I have caused you to be car-as indispensably necessary in order to escape the present and future wrath of God. Such as are most solemn in these warnings and exhortations, copy the examples of the prophets and apostles, and “men of God,” who have been before them: but smooth teachers, who deal almost exclusively in comfort, and unqualified promises, and assurances of peace and safety, without discriminating “betwixt the “precious and the vile” among the people, tread in the steps of the false prophets; and the event will prove that the Lord did not send them. The tendency also of the false doctrine, to teach men rebellion against God, always distinguishes it from the true gospel of Christ, which encourages men “to repent, and turn to God, and to do “works meet for repentance;” but gives no encouragement to continue in sin. (Notes, Ex. xiii. 10—23.)—“The “servant of the Lord must not strive, but be gentle unto “all men.” He must recede from his right, yield to violence, bear reviling and reproach with patience, and leave God to vindicate his character, and plead his cause.—The truth may be overborne, and trampled on; but it cannot be kept down; like its divine Author, it will rise again to the confusion of all who hate it.—Every attempt of ungodly men to escape the wrath, or frustrate the purpose of God, will rivet their fetters and increase their miseries: and those who encourage them in these rebellious efforts, by “causing them to trust in a lie,” (as alas! in various ways, very many do;) must expect the first, or the largest, portion of divine vengeance.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIX. V. 1. Letter.] Notes, 24—32. 2 Chr. xxx. 1. Esth. ix. 20. Acts xv. 22—29.—Preface to Romans.—Residue.] Many of the elders and others might die, by the hardships which they suffered on the road; or be cut off by the conquerors: so that the letter was addressed to the residue.—Prophets.] It does not appear, that there was any true prophet at Babylon, or in Chaldea, when this letter was sent; except Ezekiel, and Daniel who was newly entered on the prophetic office. But there were several, who were accounted prophets, and who had great influence over the people; and therefore the letter was addressed to them, along with the elders and priests.—The Septuagint read it “false prophets;” but they would hardly have been included in the address, under that title, in the letter, which was particularly intended to warn the people against false prophets.

V. 2. Queen.] Jeconiah's mother. (Notes, xxii. 24—30. xxiv. 1—7. xxviii. 2—4. 2 Kings xx. 17, 18. xxiv. 8—16. 2 Chr. xxxvi. 9, 10. Dan. i. 3—7.)

V. 3. (Marg. Ref.) These persons seem to have been sent by Zedekiah, to ratify some treaty with Nebuchadnezzar, or to make some submissions to him.

V. 4—7. The vain expectation of a speedy return to their own land, which the false prophets excited in the Jews at Babylon, led them to neglect their personal and domestic interests and comfort, and the good of the nation; and tended to betray them into measures, calculated to excite the jealousy of the victors, and to increase their own miseries. But the prophet, in the name of God, directed them to consider Babylon as their home appointed to them by him, and to take the best care they could of themselves, their families, and the nation; to use their influence and endeavours to promote the publick peace; and to pray for the welfare of the city, as the way to obtain peace to themselves. These directions tended to render them patient and contented, industrious and useful, and as comfortable as their situation would admit of. This ried away captives; and ^k pray unto the LORD for it: for in the peace thereof shall ye have peace.

8 For thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; ^l Let not your prophets and your diviners, that be in the midst of you, deceive you, neither hearken to ^m your dreams which ye cause to be dreamed.

9 For they prophesy ^{*} falsely unto you in my name: I have not sent them, saith the LORD.

10 For thus saith the LORD, That ⁿ after seventy years be accomplished at Babylon, ^o I will visit you, and perform my good word towards you, in causing you to return to this place.

11 For ^p I know the thoughts that I think toward you, saith the LORD,

^a thoughts of peace, and not of evil, to give you an [†] expected end.

12 Then ^r shall ye call upon me, and ye shall go and pray unto me, and I will hearken unto you.

13 And ^s ye shall seek me, and find me, when ye shall search for me [†] with all your heart.

14 And ^u I will be found of you, saith the LORD: ^v and I will turn away your captivity, and I will gather you from all the nations, and from all the places whither I have driven you, saith the LORD; and I will bring you again into the place whence I caused you to be carried away captive.

deportment, and their constant prayers, in all their religious assemblies, for the welfare of the community, would also help to conciliate the rulers. (Notes, Ezra vi. 6—12. 1 Tim. ii. 1, 2.) Most of these captives must end their lives at Babylon; and share the calamities and many of the advantages of that city, all their days: and their posterity must do the same, till the expiration of the appointed period. It was therefore both reasonable and prudent to pray, that there might be peace in that place, where God had assigned them their habitations: and as far as they believed his word, they would do it.—The “LORD” had caused them to be carried captive,” or all the power of the Chaldeans could not have effected it: and his will ought to be submitted to in this dispensation. (20. Note, xxvii. 4—9.) “It is the duty of all private persons, to submit to the government that protects them, and to pray for the prosperity of it. (Ezra vi. 10. 1 Tim. ii. 1, 2.) And if they are persecutors or enemies to the truth, they are to leave it to God to execute on them the judgments, he has denounced against tyrants and oppressors; which threatenings the Jews expected God would execute upon Babylon in due time. (Ps. cxxxvii. 8, 9.)” Lowth.—To pray for the peace of a city or country, and for the health or eternal salvation of the rulers, is very different from wishing success to their ambitious, rapacious, or sanguinary undertakings: though this distinction is not generally attended to.—May not the surprising change, which took place in the character of Nebuchadnezzar, (Notes, Dan. iv,) be considered as an answer to the prayers of the pious Jews for him; as the conversion of Saul was to the prayers of the Christians for their persecutors, and of Stephen for his murderers? And may not even they, who live under the most oppressive persecutors, take an encouraging hint from this consideration, as to their duty in such circumstances?

V. 8, 9. Marg. Ref.—Cause, &c. (8) By the encouragement which the Jews gave to those who promised them speedy deliverance, they, as it were, bespoke these dreams; and unprincipled men would be sure to furnish such prognostications, as they found acceptable to the people. (Notes, v. 30, 31. Mic. ii. 11. Luke vi. 24—26.)—The prophets are here joined with the diviners.

V. 10. (Notes, xxv. 8—12. 2 Chr. xxxvi. 21. Ezra i. 1—4. vi. 13—15. Dan. ix. 2, 3. Zech. i. 12, 13.) “But few in comparison of these, ... returned in person into their own country, ... so this promise was chiefly fulfilled in their posterity: and it is common in scripture to speak of blessings bestowed upon the children, as if they had actually been made good to their progenitors.” Lowth.

V. 11—14. The Lord had his plan before him; and neither the impatience of the Jews, nor the power of the Chaldeans, could alter it. He had determined, that the Chaldean monarchy should continue till the seventy years expired, and so long the Jews must remain in captivity. But he had “thoughts of peace, and not of evil,” to those who were already at Babylon. (Note, xxiv. 1—7.) These calamities were intended for their profit, and he would in due time give them that happy deliverance which they expected, or “a latter end, even hope.” (Marg. Note, xxxi. 15—17.) Other benefits, personal or publick, spiritual or temporal, they might in the mean time obtain by prayer; and they might pray to be delivered in the appointed season: but when that arrived, the Lord “would pour upon them the Spirit of grace and supplication,” and lead them to fervent prayer, and great earnestness by every means to seek his favour; and they would do it with their whole heart, and succeed, and then their captivity would be ended. (Notes, xxxiii. 3. l. 4—8. Ez. xi. 17—20, v. 19, 20. xxxvi. 20—27.) The termination of the judgments, brought on the nation by their sins, in answer to their penitent fervent prayers, had been predicted by Moses and the prophets: (Notes, Lev. xxvi. 40—45. Deut. iv. 29—31. xxx. 1—10. 1 Kings viii. 46—53:) and the same is foretold by Zechariah, as the introduction to the restoration of the Jews from their present dispersions; which some think to be here predicted, as well as their return from Babylon. (Notes, xxxiii. 3—8. Is. lxiii. 15—19. lxiv. Dan. ix. 13—20. Zech. xii. 9—14.)

V. 15. 'As Ahab, Zedekiah, and Shemaiah.' (21. 25.) This is assigned as the reason of this message being sent from God to them (1).

V. 16—20. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xxi. 4—10. xxiv. 8—10. xxxiv. 17.) 'The Septuagint step in here to our relief, by evidencing a transposition of ver. 15, which they have placed, where undoubtedly it ought to stand, immediately before ver. 21.' Blayney.—The fact is, the Septuagint wholly omit all the intervening verses; and thus connect the fifteenth verse with the twenty-first.

V. 21—23. It is probable, that these false prophets excited the people to make disturbances, or at least to be disaffected to the government; and this so offended Nebuchadnezzar, that he put them to death in a most cruel manner, to deter others from such seditious practices. (Notes, Dan. iii.) For it pleased God to deliver them into his hand, that he might punish them for their atrocious wickedness, as well as for their lying predictions. It seems that the people did not know of their villany and adulteries, till the Lord testified against them, and by exposing their secret crimes warned men against their seductions.—The accomplishment of this dreadful prediction would have a great effect upon the minds of the Jews: and when they were enraged against any one, they would not be able to think of a more dreadful imprecation, than to wish them to be like Ahab and Zedekiah. (Marg. Ref.)—The event seems to have so evidently confirmed Jeremiah's predictions, that the captives were taken off from hearkening to false prophets, and rendered more peaceable and submissive in their situation.

V. 24—32. 'This was done, after the messengers, who delivered the former message to the captives at Babylon, were returned home, who brought along with them the letter of Shemaiah.' Lowth. (28)—The word Nehelamite may signify a dreamer, (marg.) yet the formation and termination of the word more favour the conclusion, that it referred to the place from whence he had been carried captive.—Jeremiah had been a prophet for a long course of years; and the captivity of Jeconiah, and of the Jews who were carried with him to Babylon, was an accomplishment of his predictions, and an attestation given to his prophetic mission: yet Shemaiah, (pretending to be a prophet,) thought himself authorized to treat him with the most decided contempt: and by a letter, in his own name, and not in that of the elders of the people, and directed to the priests and people at Jerusalem, he excited them to silence and punish him! His letter was particularly addressed to Zephaniah, who had succeeded Jehoiada, in superintending the affairs of the temple. Zephaniah is elsewhere called “the second priest,” under Seraiah the high priest, (iii. 24.) who, some think, was also called Jehoiada.—Shemaiah thought that Zephaniah neglected his duty, in not calling Jeremiah to a severe account for his predictions, which seemed to him one great end of his advancement. Jeremiah had long been owned by God, as his appointed prophet, and Shemaiah ran without being sent: yet he charged Jeremiah with “making himself a prophet,” probably because the chief priests generally opposed him! And, though Jeremiah’s predictions coincided with the whole tenour of their scriptures: yet he wanted to have him confined as a mad man and severely punished; because he would not flatter his wicked countrymen with the hopes of prosperity! Zephaniah does not seem to have regarded the letter, and perhaps was favourably disposed to Jeremiah. (xxi. 1.) But the Lord ordered his prophet to denounce the doom of Shemaiah and of his family: and doubtless he took the first opportunity of transmitting the sentence to him.—‘He and his seed shall be destroyed, so that none of them should see the benefit of this deliverance.’ (Notes, xxviii. 15—17.)

In prison, &c. (26) Or rather, “in the stocks and in prison.” (Note, xx. 1—6, vv. 2, 3.) The first word is translated “the stocks,” in the passage referred to: the latter no where else occurs.—In Arabick, a similar root means arctum esse, to be closely confined, as in a prison.—That is mad. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14.

The zealous servant of God considers himself as bound to use every means in his power, to profit those who are far off, as well as those who are near. Writing is peculiarly profitable in this respect; and it is rendered immensely more beneficial by the invention of printing, in circulating the knowledge of the word of God. Alas! that these useful discoveries should be so generally perverted to contrary purposes; and so little comparatively improved, in promoting true religion: but, more encouraging prospects, especially by means of the Bible Societies, now open to our view.—Submission to Providence is always our duty and interest: and it is as foolish as ungrateful, to undervalue and reject the comforts within our reach, by repining for the want of those which we cannot obtain.—The interest of the church, or of posterity, should by no means be neglected, because we may not live to witness or share them. (P. O. 1 Chr. xxii. 1—10.)—Wherever our lot is cast, we ought to approve ourselves peaceable members of the community, even though subjected to hardship and oppression: considering our situation and its disadvantages, as the appointment of God; and assured that good behaviour will render it more tolerable, than turbulence and faction.—It is our duty to pray for the peace of the country in which we reside, and the welfare of those rulers who afford us any measure of protection: and if this was the duty of the Jews at Babylon, and of the Christians under Nero, it must be that of all the people of God in every age and place. Christians should therefore exceedingly fear being seduced into factious measures, which are contrary to scripture, and disgraceful to the gospel. And as no pre-intimations are given us of those great revolutions, by which power passes from one to another; and which are generally effected by those in publick situations, or by popular assemblies; it behoves us in our private stations to “study to be quiet and to mind our own business.”—The promises of God will certainly be performed in their appointed season; but that must be waited for, in the use of authorized means alone.—We know not what the thoughts of God are respecting our personal concerns, and he has “put the times and seasons in his own power:” but it should suffice us to know in general, that he has “thoughts of good, and not of evil,” towards his church, which shall at length have an expected end of her long continued oppression; and that “all things shall work together” for the believer’s good, till his trials shall be ended, and his most enlarged hopes immensely exceeded in the rest and felicity of heaven. In general we are assured, that all who “seek the LORD, and call upon him, and search for him with their whole hearts,” shall find him, and be made joyful in his salvation: and that the Lord introduces great revivals of religion, by exciting his people to fervent and united and persevering prayers and supplications. Thus they go forth to meet him, when he comes to perform his promises; and thus let us seek for that universal prevalence of the gospel, which he has taught us to expect; as well as by improving our talents in every way that we can, and heartily concurring with the efforts of those, to whom God has intrusted other and greater talents, and given superior opportunities of exerting them.

V. 15—32.

Let all beware how they call those teachers “whom they heap to themselves after their own lusts,” “prophets whom the LORD hath raised up unto them;” (Note, 2 Tim. iv. 1—5, vv. 3, 4;) or those dreams, which they cause to be dreamed coincident with their inclinations, revelations from God. The mistake is often fatal: and the teacher and his instructions should be carefully compared with the scriptures, and the nature, tendency, and effects of them well weighed.—The Lord is immutable in his purposes, and will surely be true to his word, both in punishing impenitent sinners, and in saving all who obey his gospel: and it is vain to attempt new modelling religion, by leaving out alarming and offensive truths, in order to render it more palatable to the vitiated minds of sinners. In this way men deceive themselves, and are deceived by “Satan transformed into an angel of light:” and then they are employed as “his ministers transformed into ministers of righteousness, whose end will be according to their works.” (Note, 2 Cor. xi. 13—15.) For the heart-searching God often beholds much villany in those, who teach a smooth and deceitful gospel: they frequently have their secret reasons for encouraging men to indulge their lusts; otherwise, what hope could they themselves have of escaping “the damnation of hell?” And it is an unspeakable mercy to numbers, when the crimes of such deceivers are detected, to prevent the pernicious effects of their licentious or sceptical tenets: but if they continue impenitent, they will at length become the most miserable and execrated of mankind.—It should never be forgotten, that those who are evidently walking in the broad road, are altogether improper persons to teach others the way to heaven. (Note, Matt. vii. 3—5.) Yet men of this character commonly treat the servants of God with peculiar rage or scorn: they are officious and intermeddling, and often instigate their superiors to persecute, when they have it not in their own power. Many of them think that authority, especially ecclesiastical authority, is chiefly useful in enabling those who possess it, to silence and punish the laborious ministers, whose preaching detects their ignorance and hypocrisy, and whose example shames their sloth and avarice: and they make loud outcries, that the church is betrayed by its rulers, when the true ministers of God are unmolested. In their judgment, the zealous, active preacher is a madman, or a fool, or worse: let who will be tolerated, he ought to be disgraced and silenced; and a prison and the stocks are his just desert. It is happy for mankind when men of this stamp want power adequate to their malice, and when those of greater moderation have the management of such affairs.—All the accusations brought against many laborious teachers of modern times, when fairly examined, amount to no more than this: they earnestly counsel men to attend to their true interests and present duties, and not to expect impunity in sin, or in neglect of God's salvation; but to wait for the performance of his promises in his appointed way, and in obedience to his commandments: and these “words of truth and soberness” are called madness and enthusiasm, by multitudes who scarcely ever look into the word of God! They, who are thus inveterate against the truth and those who preach it, shall not behold the good, which the Lord will do unto his people; but will be punished, according as “they have taught rebellion against him.”

NOTES.

CHAP. XXX. V. 1—3. This and some of the following chapters contain predictions as encouraging, as the preceding chapters were awful and alarming. The prophet was ordered to “write in a book,” for the use of posterity, “all the words that the LORD had spoken to him.” This seems to refer to the whole of his prophecies, and not to this particular message; and it is supposed that the substance of all his predictions has been transmitted to us.—JEHOVAH intended to restore the Jews to their own land, and to continue his worship among them: and the whole of Jeremiah's predictions would be of great use to them. As his contemporaries had almost universally neglected his warnings and exhortations, the prophet might be tempted to conclude that his labours were in vain. But this was by no means the case: for his writings would convince, lead to repentance, and encourage the Jews, during their captivity; at the approach of their deliverance they would direct their measures, and put energy into their prayers; (Notes, Dan. ix. 1—3;) and afterwards they would tend to establish successive generations in the worship of that God, who had predicted and effected all these surprising events: they would excite their praises to him for performing his promises, warn them against idolatry and iniquity, and animate them to obedience. Nay, this weeping prophet (who seems a peculiar instance of one every way fitted for usefulness, labouring for a long course of years with very little visible success,) has been made abundantly useful to the church of God, for much above two thousand years already, and will continue to be so to the end of the world!

V. 4. 'Several prophecies foretel the restoration both of Israel and Judah, and their re-union after their restoration.' Lowth. (Note, iii. 16-18. Ez. xxxvii. 15-22. Hos. iii. 4, 5.)—The Jews, who returned from Babylon, are called "Israel," and "all Israel;" but never Israel and Judah, as distinguished from each other. (Ezra ii. 70. vii. 13. x. 5. Note, Ezra vi. 16, 17.)

V. 5-9. The Lord here introduces further assurances of merciful deliverance, by speaking of the approaching miseries of the Jews, as if already come upon them. They had disregarded the predictions of these calamities: but they are here represented as "hearing a voice of trembling and fear, and not of peace:" (Marg. Ref. f.) and the dismay and distress would be so general and extreme, that every man in the land would be seen in anguish, resembling that of a woman in travail; and all would be enfeebled, pale, and fainting. (Marg. Ref. g, h.) Indeed this would be a day of so great affliction, that none had ever been like it; and it might emphatically be called "the day of Jacob's trouble:" but it would as certainly precede their deliverance, as the pangs of travail do the joy of the mother "that a child is born into the world:" and the nation would also certainly survive, and be saved out of these distresses. In that day, (namely the day of their deliverance,) the Chaldean yoke would be broken from off them, and they would be rescued from the oppression of strangers: and being weaned from idolatry, they would

9 But they shall serve the LORD their God, and David their king, whom I will raise up unto them.

10 Therefore fear thou not, O my servant Jacob, saith the LORD; neither be dismayed, O Israel: for, lo, I will save thee from afar, and thy seed from the land of their captivity; and Jacob shall return, and shall be in rest, and be quiet, and none shall make him afraid.

Perhaps it will be introduced by terrible judgments on Israel and the adjacent nations, destroying obstinate rebels and opponents; and making way for the conversion of the rest: (Notes, Is. xxiv. 17-23. Rev. xix. 11-21:) or, the miseries of the nation, since the coming of Christ, are predicted.

God has made "a full end" of the Egyptians, Syrians, Assyrians, Chaldeans, Medes and Persians, and Macedonians, and of the Pagan Roman empire, which successively scattered or oppressed Israel; so that each of them has been inseparably united with the conquering nations: yet the Jews, by an unprecedented interposition of Providence, after all their oppressions and dispersions, are preserved a distinct people to this present day! (Note, Num. xxiii. 9.) How wonderfully do undeniable facts demonstrate the divine inspiration of the scriptures! No doubt the future restoration of been provoked to it by their multiplied and obstinate in-iquities. It was therefore in vain for them to lament their miseries, or complain of hard usage: their sorrow was incurable by any other hand, except that which had inflicted it; and in order to obtain help from God, they must submit to him, and acknowledge his justice in their punishment.—“Therefore,” or yet surely (16), though they suffered justly, and could not help themselves; he intended to appear for them, and to retaliate on those who had devoured them and carried them captive: he would bind up and heal the wounds, of which the nation lay as it were expiring: and because the heathen insulted over the Jews as outcasts, and over Zion as deserted and disregarded; he promised, in mercy to the people, to cause their habitations throughout the land to be re-built, as well as the city upon its old foundation, which during the captivity was a heap of ruins: and that the temple should be restored, and remain after the ancient manner, the centre of their worship, and the place of their solemn feasts and sacrifices. (Note, xxxi. 38—40.)—These verses were accomplished in the return of the Jews from Babylon, and the judgments executed on their oppressors: yet the connexion confirms the opinion, that they will receive a more extraordinary fulfilment, in the future dealings of God with the nation of Israel and with all their oppressors. (Note

V. 12—18. The Lord here speaks of the condition of Judah and Israel, in the extremity of their distresses, as it appeared to them and to others; and as it would have been without his immediate interposition. Their bruises were incurable by any human power, they had been so grievously wounded and crushed. None had skill to effect a cure, or to bind up their wounds, nor had they any healing medicines. (Notes, Job v. 18, 19. Hos. vi. 1—3.) None could plead for them with the victors, to restore them to their land, or to shew them favour; nor had they any means of recovering liberty, and re-establishing their church and state, or even of rendering their bondage more tolerable. ‘None knows the true nature of thy malady; or what medicines are to be applied to thy case.’ Lowth.

Ezr. i. 8—11. Zech. viii. 7—23.) After the captivity, the Jews would have abundant cause for joy and thanksgiving: for the Lord promised that he would exceedingly multiply and prosper them: their posterity should be taken care of, as the children of the covenant, in the same manner as they had been in former ages; the nation should be established as his congregation, and their oppressors be severely punished. They would also be governed by magistrates of their own nation, and not of the gentiles, as during the captivity; and even their chief governor would be raised up from among themselves: the Lord would cause him to draw near unto him, to enquire his will, and present his appointed worship; for who, (except thus taught, and drawn of God,) had ever engaged his heart to approach unto the Lord? The prophecy was thus accomplished in some measure, by the increase and prosperity of the Jews in their own land, under the government of several rulers of their own nation: these, for a considerable time, were the high priests, who by office drew near before God, even into the most holy place, as the typical intercessors for the people whom they governed. Yet the Jews after the captivity, were seldom, if ever, free from dependence on strangers, and were frequently oppressed by them; and many of their rulers were very far from meriting the character here given. But when Christ arose, and was advanced to the mediatorial throne, as High Priest and King in one person, and in this character drew near before God, in behalf of his people, having engaged his heart to pass through all his previous sufferings as their all-atoning sacrifice; the prediction was, in this respect, literally fulfilled: and when Israel and Judah shall believe in this Prince and Saviour, and submit to him, they shall be restored to their own land; and the whole will be fully accomplished. But “who is this, that engages his heart to undertake so arduous a service?” Who is this, that ventures to intercede for sinners before a just and holy God? Is he not “the Son of God,” and “the Lord of glory,” “in whom the Father is well pleased,” and whom “all the angels of God worship?” And through him, all that believe, become the people of God, and he becomes their Portion and Salvation. V. 23, 24.—(Note, xxiii. 19, 20.) These verses may be understood of those enemies of the Jews, who attempted to hinder their return to their own land, or who afterwards molested or oppressed them: in this sense, they were fulfilled in the subversion of the Babylonish empire; and in the slaughter of those, who sought the destruction of the Jews, in the days of Esther and Mordecai; and afterwards in the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes, and those who concurred in his cruel persecutions.—But if we explain the preceding verses of Christ and his kingdom, and of events which shall occur in future times; these, most naturally, and consistently with the context, refer to the unbelieving Jews themselves, and to the terrible ruin which came on them, for wickedly rejecting and crucifying Christ, and opposing the setting up of his kingdom. These judgments came from “the fierce anger of the LORD,” and the effects of them continue to this day: and in the latter days the nation of Israel will consider the rejection of that “Governor, who proceeded from themselves,” as the cause of all their miseries. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS

The discoveries, which God has made of his truth and will, his counsels and purposes, have been carefully registered and preserved, for the benefit of future generations: and he speaks to us by the writings of his ancient servants, as plainly as he did to their contemporaries by their mouths. Let us then value, and study with humble diligence and obedient faith, these sacred records.—Those who simply serve God, and are zealous for his glory, will in one way or another be useful to their fellow sinners: some of his ministers are most useful during their lives, by preaching; and others speak most effectually, after their death, by their writings: but “as every man hath received the gift, so let him minister, as a good steward of the manifold grace of God:” and “let us not be weary in well doing; for in due season we shall reap, if

(Notes, Gal. vi. 6—10, vv. 9, 10. 1 Pet. iv. 9—11.)—Sin leads to terror and dismay: they, who will not tremble at the word of God, must tremble at his judgments: obstinate transgressors will hear a voice of terror, and not of peace: and if temporal calamities dismay and distress the stoutest and most intrepid, what will be the wrath to come? Afflictions in this world frequently prove the means of good, and are never entirely without hope; but future punishment will be unmingled, hopeless misery.—Deep convictions of sin and terrors of conscience, attended with sharp temptations and afflictions, often cause a time of trouble so great, that the awakened sinner has never before known any thing like it: but it frequently proves a happy crisis, when attended with "that godly sorrow, which worketh repentance unto salvation not to be repented of;" and in due time he shall be saved out of it. (P. O. Job ix. 22—35.) For our gracious God will pardon his sins, speak peace to his conscience, and break off the yoke of sin and Satan; that, "being delivered from all his enemies, he may serve God without fear, in righteousness and true holiness before him," all the remnant of his days, as the redeemed subject of Christ our King, whom the Father has raised up unto us. The believer also may have days of great affliction and temptations, and even of terror and dismay; but he shall be saved from them all: and even death, which is such a time of trouble as can but once be experienced, will be to him a season of complete deliverance, and an introduction to "the joy of his Lord."

Let none of those who devotedly and zealously serve God, fear or be dismayed, on his own account, or on that of the church; for victory and triumph await them. Believers shall be gathered into his heavenly kingdom, from afar, and out of all their dispersions; faith, with submission to God, will give them rest and quietness here on earth; and none shall durably make them afraid. He will be with them to save them: though he "correct them," it shall be "in measure," and for their good; and he will "not make a full end of them," as of the wicked around them.—Yet the wounds and bruises, which he sometimes inflicts, seem very grievous, and are incurable by any hand but his. Every effort to heal ourselves must prove fruitless: for we have none to plead our cause, that we may be bound up; nor any healing medicines, so long as we neglect the heavenly Advocate and the sanctifying Spirit. (Notes, xxxiii. 6—9. Hos. vi. 1—3.) All earthly comforts and comforters will soon fail us: and when we consider the number and heinousness of our sins, we may be ready to consider God himself as our irreconcilable enemy, and every chastisement as "the wound of a cruel one;" and so long as we only repine at our affliction, our sorrows remain incurable. But when we are thus driven from every false refuge, and led to acknowledge that God is just in all which he inflicts or threatens, and that we suffer far less than we deserve; we submit to his righteousness and accept of his mercy. Then he rebukes our enemies, and rescues us from the jaws of the devourer: he binds up the broken heart, and cures the sin-distempered soul; and gives complete and eternal salvation. The dealings of his grace, with every true convert, and every returning backslider, are exactly the same, upon a smaller scale, as his dealings with the Jews. And in the same manner he corrects, humbles, pardons, heals, and restores offending churches from age to age: for the Redeemer of Israel is "the same yesterday, to day, and for ever."

Our God will certainly comfort all those, who penitently turn unto him: and when he increases and glorifies his church, all who sympathized in its sorrows and prayed for its prosperity, will rejoice and be thankful.—It is a great mercy to nations to be ruled by prudent princes and magistrates, who are "of themselves," and have their welfare at heart: but still more so to be governed by those, whom the Lord "causes to draw near unto him," as his accepted servants and worshippers.—Those who approach him, must have "their hearts engaged" to do it in reverence, devotion, and faith: but who of our sinful race could thus have ventured to approach the holy God, who is "a consuming Fire" to all the workers of iniquity; if Christ, our King and High Priest, had not engaged to atone for our sins and were not entered into the true sanctuary, to appear in his presence on our behalf? Through him we find acceptance, and "access with boldness" to the throne of grace: we become "his people, and have the LORD for our God." How then will they "escape, who neglect so great salvation?" For "behold, the whirlwind of the LORD still goeth forth with fury," and his continual indignation will "fall with pain on the head of the wicked;" nor "will it return, till he hath performed the intents of his heart," in the destruction of all those, who obey not the gospel of his Son. (Note, 2 Thes. i. 5—10.) May we consider seriously these declarations, and the doom of former enemies of the gospel: may we duly attend to these things before those latter days come, when consideration will only increase the anguish of all, who have perished without remedy.

latter days of the church. (Note, xxx. 23, 24.)—Not only would the Jews be re-instated in their privileges as the people of God; but the same blessing was promised to “all the families of Israel.” (See on Note, xxx. 22, Notes, xxx. 4. 19—21. Gen. xvii. 7, 8. Heb. xi. 17—19. Rev. xxi. 1—4, v. 3.) Some Israelites returned with the Jews from Babylon; and probably more of them were incorporated among them, in the several places where they settled; and many of them were converted to Christianity in the primitive ages: yet these things formed only a partial accomplishment of the prediction. But “in the latter days,” when the Jews “shall be turned to the Lord, all Israel shall be saved;” (Note, Rom. xi. 25—32;) and when JEHOVAH will emphatically be “the God of all the families of Israel:” and when the fulness of the Gentiles shall be brought in, even those of Israel, that are inseparably incorporated with them, will obtain admission into the church. Several parts of this prophecy evidently look forward thus far: yet various previous events are noticed in the course of it, as introductory to its grand completion. (Notes, iii. 16—19. xxiii. 5—8. xxxii. 39—41. xxiii. 23—26.)

V. 2, The Israelites, who had escaped the murdering word of Pharaoh, and the hostile attempts of the Amalekites and other enemies, were marvellously preserved and favoured by JEHOVAH in the wilderness; and, notwithstanding their rebellions and chastisements, the nation was at length put in possession of Canaan, and there established, increased, and prospered: because God went with them, to give them the rest and inheritance which he had promised to their fathers.—In like manner the remnant, which escaped the sword of the Chaldeans, would find favour with God, and be re-established in their own land. And after the still more terrible havock made of them by the Romans, and in their consequent long continued dispersions, similar favours are intended them. (Notes, ii. 2—7. Ez. xx. 13—17.)

V. 3—5. Israel seems here introduced, as recollecting how God in times of old had made himself known to the fathers of the nation, and appeared for their deliverance; with a silent regret that he now seemed to forsake them. To this the Lord answered, (for “saying” is not in the original;) “Truly I have loved thee with an everlasting “love; therefore with loving-kindness have I drawn thee,” or, “I have prolonged mercy to thee.” (Marg.—Notes, Deut. vii. 6—8. ix. 4—6. Mal. i. 2—5. iii. 5, 6, v. 6. Rom. xi. 1—6. 11—15. 25—32.) From the beginning God had peculiarly favoured them, and he would continue thus to favour them to the end; his purposes of love had been from everlasting, and the effects of them would be to everlasting: his loving-kindness had drawn them into a special relation to him; and it would yet prevail to bring them again into possession of their privileges, and to re-establish them in prosperity, (Notes, Cant. i. 4. Ez. xvi. 3—8. Hos. xi. 3, 4. John vi. 41—46. Eph. i. 3—8. ii. 1—10.) The nation was considered as a virgin who had been betrothed to him: and, instead of mourning as she had done, (vii. 34. xxv. 10,) like one that was deserted and desolate; she should be adorned with festive garments, and express her gladness of heart by such tokens, as young persons do on joyful occasions. (Marg. Ref. m.) They would also again possess their own land, and there plant vineyards which would yield a great increase.—Some of the Israelites who at different periods returned with the Jews from captivity, doubtless got possession of their ancient inheritances; but this evidently refers to events yet future. “Samaria being ‘the metropolis of the ten tribes, seems to be put for the ‘kingdom of Israel. ...The “mountains of Samaria,” are ‘equivalent to the “mountains of Israel.”’ Lowth. (Notes, Ez. xxxvi. 1—10. xxxvii. 20—22.)

Eat them as common things. (5) The word literally signifies, “shall profane them.” (Marg.)—“It alludes to ‘the law that forbade the fruit of any young trees to be ‘eaten, till the fifth year of their bearing, when the fruit ‘was lawful or common for every one to eat. Deut. xx. 6. ‘xxxviii. 30.’ Lowth. (Lev. xix. 23—25.)

V. 6, 7. “The day is; the watchmen proclaim.” The Jews, and Ephraim or the ten tribes, are here represented. as already in possession of their own land; and all their former jealousies and divisions are ceased: so that the watchmen, the teachers or prophets, of Ephraim excite the people to resort to mount Zion to worship. (Notes, 1. vi. 16, 17. Ps. cxviii. 19—24. Is. ii. 2—5. xl. 3—8. Mic. iv. 1—5.) This may refer to the union of different nations in the church of Christ, and their harmonious worship, and amicable communion in the privileges and ordinances of the gospel. This is further intimated, when “among the chief of the nations” men are called on to rejoice, and praise God for his goodness to Jacob, and to mingle prayers, with their praises, for the more complete salvation of the remnant of Israel.—The most powerful, renowned, and civilized nations on earth at this day, professing Christianity, praising God for his mercies to his ancient people, and praying for the conversion and salvation of the Jews, forms a striking accomplishment of this prophecy. (Note, Zech. viii. 20—23.) But the re-establishment of Judah and Israel in their own land are especially foretold.

Watchmen. (6) ‘The word may be applied to those ‘evangelical preachers, who should be instruments in converting the Jews to Christ, and bringing them into the ‘church.’ Lowth.

V. 8, 9. In answer to these prayers, or rather to excite these praises, the Lord here promises to bring Israel from the utmost coasts of the earth, without excluding the blind, the lame, the woman with child, or even her who travails with child: however feeble or unable they were of themselves, or however distressed in their circumstances, or burdened in spirit; under the protection and tender care of God, and willingly assisting each other, they would return in a great company to Zion. (Notes, Ps. cv. 37, 38, v. 37. Is. xl. 8—11, v. 11.) Mourning for their sins, nay, weeping even for joy, and praying for themselves and for each other; the Lord being their Guide, they would walk by the rivers of waters, every obstacle be removed, and their way made plain before them: for God would avow himself the Father of all Israel; and even Ephraim, who seemed quite cast off, should inherit as his first-born. (Notes, 18—20. iii. 12—19. l. 4—6. Is. xxxv. 8—10. xli. 17—20. xlix. 9—13.)—The return of a few Israelites with the Jews, after the captivity, cannot come up to the full meaning of these predictions; nor can any other gathering of Israel to their own land which has hitherto taken place. They may figuratively describe the conversion of sinners to Christ; their helpless condition in themselves; the burdens and distresses under which they labour; the repentance and prayer with which they come; the comforts and assistance which they derive from their tender Guide and Shepherd; the plain and safe way in which they are led; and their adoption as children and heirs of the Lord Almighty. But there is abundant reason to conclude, that they also predict a future gathering of the Israelites to Christ, and into their own land, from all the quarters of the globe (Marg. Ref.)—First-born. (9) Notes, Gen. xlviii. 14, 17—20. xlix. 22—26. 1 Chr. v. 1, 2. Heb. xii. 22—25.

V. 10—14. The same subject is here further enlarged on. Let all the most distant nations hear, that JEHOVAH who scattered Israel, would gather him again into his church, as a shepherd does his flock into his fold. (Marg. Ref. f, g.) By breaking the power of the Assyrians and Chaldeans, he redeemed Jacob from enemies stronger than he: by breaking the yoke of Satan, he redeems the true Israel from this potent enemy: (Notes, Is. xlix. 24—26. Matt. xii. 29, 30. Luke xi. 14—26, vv. 21, 22 :) and by crushing the power of Antichrist, he will deliver his church and make way for the conversion of both Israel and the Gentiles.—The return of the Jews to mount Zion with songs of praise, and their “flowing together” to enjoy “the goodness of the LORD,” and to thank him with joyful hearts for their plenty and prosperity; (Marg. Ref. n. p—r.—Notes, 3—5. xxxiii. 6—11. Is. iv. 2. Zech. vii. 4, 5. ix. 13—17 :) together with the revival of religion, and the holy joy which shewed itself among them, after the building of the city and temple, and was manifested in varied expressions, by all orders and ranks of the people were emblems of the abundant holiness, privileges, and comforts reserved for the church, in those happy times which are approaching.—Nothing, however, has yet o curring that can be considered as a completion of this prediction; which certainly relates to events in futurity, and especially to the restoration and prosperity of Israel, as a nation. (*Marg. V. 15—17. The original name of Rachel is here exactly the same as in Genesis.—Rachel was mother to Joseph and Benjamin: from Joseph descended a very large proportion of the kingdom of Israel; and from Benjamin, numbers of the inhabitants of Jerusalem. The desolations of Israel and Judah, therefore, made immense havock among Rachel's descendants. The sepulchre of Rachel was between Ramah and Bethlehem: (Gen. xxxv. 16—20:) and she is here poetically introduced, as rising from her grave, looking around, seeing none of her offspring, and inconsolable in her sorrow, supposing them all utterly extirpated. To carry on the allusion, the Lord here addresses her, and calls on her to "refrain from weeping:" for her sorrow and labour, in bearing and bringing up her children, should not be lost, or be without recompence; as those, who were left and scattered among their enemies, would come again to their own land; and she might hope for great blessings for them in "her end," or "latter end." (See on Note, xxx. 23, 24, v. 24.) The murder of the children in the coasts of Bethlehem, by Herod, was an event, which in some measure fulfilled this prediction: but it could not be the primary and full meaning of it. (Note, Matt. ii. 16—18.)

V. 18—20. All the blessings predicted to Israel implied, that the people would be brought to true and deep repentance. This is here more particularly described, in the person of Ephraim, as representing the ten tribes of Israel. The Lord hears him under his afflictions, bemoaning himself with penitent confessions and prayers. He looks back, and recollects with grief and shame, that the Lord had often chastised him, and that he had suffered many corrections without deriving benefit: or that at length he had "received instruction," though he had long been refractory and rebellious; as headstrong bullocks, not inured to the yoke, which struggle against the driver, and will not submit.—Conscious that this is the nature of his proud, stout heart, and that it must be humbled, softened, and converted; and that he cannot effect this change by his own power; he believes that God can, hopes that he will, and prays that he would "turn him, that he may be turned." (Notes, xvii. 14. Acts v. 29—31.) He acknowledges, that the Lord has a right to his obedience and service, and that he stands in a peculiar relation to him, and he desires to have him for his God and Portion.—Something of this gracious turning he experiences; he has begun to repent of his sins: and, since he had been instructed in the things of God, he is sensible of his guilt and danger, and full of self-indignation and abhorrence, to think how rebellious and ungrateful he had before been; which astonishment and self-displacency he expresses by "smiting on his thigh." He is grieved and utterly confounded to find, that he lies under a heavy load of deserved ignominy and reproach, for the sins which he had been committing from his youth, which deserved more than all the contempt and misery that he suffered. The Lord seeing Ephraim, like the prodigal son, thus "come to himself," and overwhelmed with sorrow and shame, speaks of him with the tenderest affection. (Notes, Luke xv. 17—21.) Could this poor distressed mourner be Ephraim, his dear son, his child in whom he had so delighted? And was he at length returned home? Let him not be upbraided with his offences, of which he so deeply repented; but let him be re-admitted to all the privileges of a child, without limitation or delay. For ever since the Lord denounced sentence against him, or addressed him with cutting rebukes; he had remembered him with tender compassion, and earnest longings after him, as an affectionate parent does his son, whom he is under the painful necessity of correcting. (Note, Ps. ciii. 11—13.)—His eye was upon him through all his wanderings, waiting to be gracious: and as he was now truly penitent and supplicated mercy, he would surely extend it to him.—'Do thou turn my heart by thy preventing grace, and then I shall be effectually reformed.

21 ^s Set thee up way-marks, make thee high heaps: ^t set thine heart toward the high-way, even the way which thou wentest: ^v turn again, ^o O virgin of Israel, turn again to these thy cities.

22 ^u How long wilt thou go about, O thou ^v backsliding daughter? for the LORD hath ^x created a new thing in the earth, ^y A woman shall compass a man.

‘... As soon as God’s grace touched my heart, and gave me a due sense of my duty, and the many deviations from it I had been guilty of, I straightway became a true penitent; and expressed my repentance by all the outward and inward signs of an unfeigned sorrow. The burden of my former sins lay heavy on my mind; and I became sensible, that all the calamities and reproaches I have undergone, were the due desert of mine offences.’

Lowth.—This is a most instructive and encouraging representation of the nature and effects of true repentance: and its prophetick meaning may relate to the conversion of Israelites to Christianity in the primitive times; but it refers rather to events yet in futurity. (Notes, Job xxxiii. 27—30. Ez. xvi. 60—63. xxxvi. 25—32. Hos. xi. 8—11. Zech. xii. 9—14.)

V. 21, 22. The dispersed Jews and Israelites are here called on to return without delay to their deserted cities, and to set up way-marks, to throw up heaps, and to set up lofty standards, to direct enquirers in the road. Let them heartily attempt to go back to their own land, by the way in which they had gone from it, and no longer wander about as they had done; like a woman, who had improperly left her father’s or her husband’s house, and was afraid, and ashamed, or reluctant to return. (Note, ii. 14—19.) To encourage them to this, the Lord assures them, that “he had created,” or would create, “a new thing in the earth.” It would be “a new thing,” altogether unprecedented, and worthy to be called a creation: for “a woman should compass a man,” or a Mighty one, a great Deliverer. Now what can this more properly mean, than that a virgin, continuing so, should conceive, and compass in her womb, and bear a Son, who would be “that Seed of the woman,” which was appointed to “bruise the serpent’s head;” even “EMMANUEL, God with us?” This was effected by the immediate power of God, contrary to the established course of nature: it was “a new thing,” both as to his miraculous conception, and his mysterious person: and it was adduced with great propriety for the encouragement of the Jews, to return to that land, where this promised Deliverer was at length to arise.—“As it is a new thing, and unheard of, that a woman should court a man; so God will bring as strange a thing to pass, that the Jewish nation shall return to God their Husband. ... So most of the modern Jews, and some Christian expositors understand the words. ... A woman, that is, the most feeble, despicable persons, compared else-

Lowth. These are the most plausible interpretations, given of the passage; by those who reject that which is stated above. But the narrative of Potiphar’s wife; (Notes, Gen. xxxix.) and that of Deborah, Jael, and Sisera; (Notes, Judg. iv. v.) and very many others, suffice to shew, that neither of these was “a new thing in the earth:” (Num. xvi. 29—34.) and surely the solemnity of the introduction, and the term “create,” appear, on either interpretation, to have little propriety or meaning.—“One that is only a woman, and not a wife, namely a virgin, shall conceive in her womb a man-child. (Rev. xii. 5.) This is truly “a new thing,” never before related, or heard of: without which satisfaction could not be obtained by the weary soul, nor the new covenant established. (31—34.) By this the backsliding daughter, namely the nation of the Jews which was turned away from God, ought to be so influenced, as no longer to wander about, at a distance from him.’ Cocceius.—It is observable, that the other predictions of the miraculous conception, are conveyed in an obscure manner, and have caused much difficulty to expositors: (Notes, Gen. iii. 14, 15. Is. vii. 14.) and it seems exceedingly proper, that the clear and express declaration of such an event should be subsequent to its having actually taken place.—“Several ancient Jews expounded the text of the Messias. ... And most Christian interpreters understand it of the miraculous conception of the virgin Mary. ... Taking the words in this sense, they properly import a new creation, and such as is the immediate work of God. ... The coming of the Messias is the foundation of all the promises both of the first and second covenant: (2 Cor. i. 20:) ... and that covenant, of which Christ was to be the Mediator, is plainly foretold and described at the thirty-first and following verses of this chapter.

Lowth.

V. 23—26. After the desolations of Judah, Jerusalem and the temple, which had been called “the habitation of justice and the mountain of holiness;” prayers for the prosperity of Zion were greatly discouraged: but the suspension would be taken off by the return of the Jews from captivity: and then such expressions of good-will would be frequent and fervent. (Notes, Ps. cii. 12—22. Dan. iv. 1—20.) For the Lord had purposed to satisfy and comfort every one, who was wearied with trials, and sorry for his sins; or who sympathized in the sorrows of his afflicted people: and the outward blessings, to which he meant to restore them, would be typical of the spiritual prosperity of the church, in the times of the gospel, and in the latter days. (Notes, xvi. 14, 15. 19—21. xxxiii. 5—8. xxxiii. 10—16.) This, and indeed the former part of the prophecy, seems to have been presented before the prophet's mind in a dream or vision: and when he awaked and considered it, he was refreshed with the pleasing prospect, so contrary to the visions which he had generally experienced, as one that awakes from an undisturbed and pleasant sleep.—'Having seen this vision of the Messiah to come, in whom the two houses of Israel and Judah should be joined, I rejoiced.' (Marg. Ref. g, h.)

V. 27, 28. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xviii. 7—10. xxx. 19—22. xlv. 4, 5. Is. xxvii. 2—6.) 'I will shew the same care and vigilance, (xlv. 27,) in restoring them, as I have formerly done in destroying them.' Lowth.—Some understand the passage of the replenishing of the church by numerous converts, and establishing it in peace and prosperity.

V. 29, 30. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Ez. xviii. 2—4.) The people thought it hard, that they should suffer for the sins of their fathers, (though it was evident, that they imitated and exceeded them, and thus filled up the measure of their iniquities;) and they expressed their murmurs by a proverb, stating that the children's teeth were set on edge, or put to pain, by the father's eating sour grapes. (Notes, xv. 2—4, v. 4. Ex. xx. 5. 2 Kings xxiii. 26, 27.) But the Lord assures them, that in the happy days here predicted, they should neither have occasion nor disposition, thus to reflect on the equity of his dealings: 'but shall willingly acknowledge, that every one of them had smarted for his own iniquity; and had sins enow of his own, to warrant God's proceedings against him.' Bp. Hall.—When Christ came, all who believed on him, separated from their unbelieving countrymen, and escaped the national calamities.—'This will be remarkably verified, when God shall cease to visit on the Jewish nation the imprecation, which they laid on themselves for the death of Christ; "His blood be upon us and on our children." ' Lowth. Notes, Matt. xxvii. 24, 25.)—The conduct of every generation of that people to this day, has been equivalent to "consenting to the deed" of those, who put Jesus to death; for they all in speaking and acting respecting him, as a deceiver, have crucified him afresh, and made the guilt of their ancestors their own. Of this they will be convinced, when converted to Christ. (Note, Zech. xii. 9—14, v. 10.)

V. 31, 32. The national covenant, made at Sinai with Israel when brought out of Egypt, is here contrasted with "the new covenant." Notwithstanding the tender and compassionate care of JEHOVAH to Israel at that time, when he espoused the nation to himself; they proved unfaithful, and brake the covenant by apostasy, idolatry, and all kinds of atrocious iniquity: and at length, rejecting the Messiah, they were cast out of the church, and expelled from the promised land. This covenant was distinct, both from the covenant of works, of which Adam was the surety, and under which every unbeliever in every age and nation is found; from the covenant ratified with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; and from the covenant of grace, mediated by Christ, of which every believing Israelite received the blessing. (Notes, Ex. xix. 5. Lev. xxvi. 41, 42. Ez. xvi. 60—63. Gal. iii. 15—18. Heb. vi. 13—20.) This promise of a new covenant, as St. Paul has shewn, implied a prediction of the abrogation of the Mosaic law, and the introduction of another and more spiritual dispensation. (Notes, Heb. viii. 7—13. x. 11—18.)

Took them by the hand, &c. (32) Notes, Deut. i. 29—31. Hos. xi. 3, 4.—[Brake.] Or, rendered void or disannulled.—I was an husband, &c.] 'I acted towards them, with all the faithful, affectionate care, which the husband owes to his wife.' (Marg.—Notes, ii. 2, 3. iii. 12—15. Ez. xvi. 9—14. Hos. ii. 18—23. Eph. v. 28—31.) This clause is rendered in the Septuagint, "I regarded them not." St. Paul follows that version in this respect, though he varies from it in several parts of his quotation.—Some think the original may admit of this translation; but it is not the obvious meaning.—Israel as a nation typified the true people of God: the old covenant, made with them, was typical of the new covenant made with all true believers, as one with Christ. This is not ratified with a nation as such; (though every Christian nation is under a dispensation of mercy, according to this covenant, in some things as Israel;) but it is made with Christ the Surety, in behalf of his people, and with each of them personally, when by faith he becomes a member of his mys-

33 But ^y this shall be the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel; After those days, saith the LORD, ^z I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts; ^a and will be their God, and they shall be my people.

34 And they shall ^b teach no more every man his neighbour, and every man his brother, saying, ^c Know the LORD: ^d for they shall all know me, from the least of them unto the greatest of them, saith the LORD: ^e for I will forgive their iniquity, and I will remember their sin no more.

35 ¶ Thus saith the LORD, ^f which giveth the sun for a light by day, and the ordinances of the moon and of the stars for a light by night, ^g which divideth the sea ^h when the waves thereof roar; ⁱ The LORD of hosts is his name:

36 If ^k those ordinances depart from before me, saith the LORD, ^l then shall the seed of Israel also cease from being a nation before me for ever.

37 Thus saith the LORD; ^m if heaven above can be measured, and the foundations of the earth searched out beneath, ⁿ I will also cast off all the seed of Israel, for all that they have done, saith the LORD.

38 ¶ Behold, ^o the days come, saith the LORD, ^p that the city shall be built to the LORD, from ^q the tower of Haneel unto ^r the gate of the corner.

39 And ^s the measuring line shall yet go forth over against it upon the hill Gareb, and shall compass about to Goath.

40 And the ^t whole valley of the dead bodies, and of the ashes, and all the fields unto ^u the brook of Kidron, ^v unto the corner of the horse-gate toward the east, ^w shall be holy unto the LORD; ^x it shall not be plucked up, nor thrown down any more for ever.

of all their sins, and he will not remember them any more to their condemnation. (Notes, 1. 20. Ps. ciii. 11—13. Is. xliii. 22—25. Mic. vii. 18—20. John v. 24—27. Rom. viii. 1, 2. 28—39.) The law thus written in their hearts, with the knowledge of God thus communicated, preserves them from breaking the covenant, and again coming into condemnation, by relapsing into iniquity, and living and dying in impenitence and unbelief. So that it is the peculiar excellency of this covenant, that it provides against all those dangers, which otherwise might deprive the persons interested in it of the covenanted blessings. (Notes, xxxii. 39—41, 2 Sam. xxiii. 5.)—When Israel shall be again called into the church, it will not be according to the Sinai-covenant; but by having “the law written in their hearts,” and the covenant thus inwardly ratified to them, (Notes, Ez. xvi. 60—63, v. 61. xxxvi. 20—28. xxxvii. 23—28. xxxix. 23—29.)—“Lord have mercy upon us” also, “and write all ... thy laws in our hearts, we beseech thee.” Communion service.

V. 35—37. As surely as the heavenly bodies will continue their settled course, according to the appointment of the Creator to the end of time; and as the raging sea obeys the Creator's mandates; so surely will the nation of Israel be continued a separate people, without being finally excluded from the church: nor will God ever cast them off for all their sins; till it be possible for man to measure the height of the heavens, or to search out the foundations of the earth. (Notes, xxxiii. 14—26, Gen. i. 14—19. Job xxxviii. 4—11. Ps. xciii. 3, 4. cxiv. 3—8. Is. li. 15, 16. liv. 6—10. Matt. viii. 23—27. Rom. xi. 11—15. 22—32. Words can hardly express more energetically a prophecy of the Restoration of Israel.

V. 38—40. The rebuilding of Jerusalem after the captical body. (Notes, Is. lv. 1—3. Luke i. 67—79. Gal. iii. 6—14. Heb. xiii. 19, 20.)

V. 33, 34. The moral law was written “in tables of stone,” and in the book of the law, and put into the hands of the Israelites; but they brake it, for want of a spiritual mind; and thus it brought them under condemnation: (Notes, Rom. vii. 7—12. 2 Cor. iii. 7—11:) but, according to “the new covenant,” God engages to “put his law into the inward parts, and to write it in the hearts” of his people. That is, by regenerating grace, he creates in them a judgment, disposition, and affections congenial to the holy law of love: then they perceive its spirituality, reasonableness, and excellency; they “consent to it that it is good;” they repent of breaking it; they see the nature, value, and glory of salvation in Christ, and accept of it; they hope for pardon, righteousness, and assistance through him; and thus they learn to “delight in the law after the inward man,” and to grieve and be humbled that they keep it so imperfectly. (Notes, Ps. cxix. 2—5. Rom. vii. 22—25.) In this way the LORD becomes their God, and they his people, prepared for the daily exercise of repentance, faith, humble conscientious obedience, and the spiritual worship of him in his ordinances. (See on Note, xxx. 22.—Notes, 1. xxx. 19—21. Gen. xvii. 7, 8. Heb. xi. 13—16. Rev. xxi. 1—4.) It is not requisite for persons of this character to call one another off from idols to the knowledge and worship of JEHOVAH; (Note, Is. ii. 2—5;) nor are they left to mere human teaching; but the whole company, “from the greatest to the least,” have “an heart given them to know the LORD,” so as to fear, trust, and love him, and to cleave to his worship and service. (Marg. Ref. c, d.—Notes, xxiv. 7. Is. liv. 11—14. John vi. 41—46.) Then he absolves them from the guilt

CHAP. XXXII.

Jeremiah is imprisoned, for predicting the destruction of Jerusalem, and the captivity of Zedekiah, 1—5. By the command of God he purchases a field, as a token that the Jews should be restored to their inheritances, 6—15. He prays to be further instructed concerning these transactions, 16—25. tivity seems to be here predicted merely as an earnest of all the other promised mercies. At present we know little of several of the places mentioned. (Marg. Ref.—Neh. iii. 1. 24—28. xii. 39.)—The conclusion fully proves that the Spirit of prophecy meant not only to predict the building of the spiritual Jerusalem, but also to foretel future events which cannot now be particularly known; yet certainly relate to the future and final restoration of Israel. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS

The greatest blessing which we can desire for our families, is that “the LORD may be their God:” and if we devote them to him, and bring them up for him, we may expect that this will be their felicity. (Notes, Gen. xvii. 7, 8. xviii. 17—19.)—When he commissions the sword to waste the nations, where his name is known, he reserves a remnant to whom he will be gracious: and often those judgments, which sweep numbers of hypocrites and ungodly men into perdition, make way for peculiar blessings to their survivors, or to posterity.—If we find grace with God, he will lead us through all the perils and difficulties of this wilderness, and cause us to rest in his salvation. All the discoveries, which he has made of himself to fallen man, and all his marvellous works for his church, have sprung from his everlasting and unchangeable love. This induced him to form the glorious plan of salvation; and first to promise, and then to give, his beloved Son to be the sacrifice for our sins: and this also moved him to draw us by his grace and allure us by his loving-kindness, to come unto him, and seek a share in the purchased blessings: and having been thus drawn to seek communion with him and conformity to him, we shall for ever enjoy the fruits of his special favour. (Notes, Eph. ii. 1—10. 2 Thes. ii. 13, 14. Tit. iii. 4—7.) From the same endearing motive, JEHOVAH is led to “build up the walls of “Jerusalem,” and to turn the mournings of his people over her desolations, into songs of triumphant praises for her renewed prosperity.—Those whom he has placed near to his “watchmen, who watch for their souls,” and who excite and exhort sinners to arise and go up to Zion to the Lord our God, have special obligations to bless his name. All those who are called to this work should be peculiarly vigilant, faithful, and earnest; and they ought themselves first to rise and lead the way by their example, “walking “in all God’s ordinances and commandments, blameless.” They should endeavour also to terminate those unhappy differences, which, as it were, set the tribes of Israel at variance: and all Christians ought to pray that many watchmen, decidedly of this character, may be raised up, and stationed in every place; and especially employed to call the ancient people of God to rejoin his church and share her privileges.—“The chief of the nations,” and Britain especially, (which seems to be rendered pre-eminent in commerce and navigation, for that very purpose,) should celebrate with gladness the wondrous works of God for Jacob, in the great Redeemer raised up among that people; and should publish these glad tidings to all around, with praise and gratitude, that they may be proclaimed from shore to shore, till the utmost coasts of the earth are made acquainted with the joyful sound: nor should we forget to join our earnest endeavours, with our fervent prayers, that the Lord may “save his people, even the remnant of “Israel.”

V. 8—17.

When the Lord’s time arrives, his power and grace can readily remove all obstacles, rectify all obliquities, and remedy all defects: he can give “eyes to the blind,” and “feet to the lame,” strength to the weak, support to the heavy-laden, and rest to the weary soul; and thus bring great companies into his church. When he effectually draws sinners to come to him, their hard hearts soon melt and soften; and they, who once were too proud and stout to attend on the ordinances of God, and the animated prayers and praises of evangelical piety, and who derided those that did, learn to mourn for sin, and cry for mercy. Then he leads them in his ways, supplies their wants, refreshes and comforts their hearts, upholds them from falling, and is a Father unto them, and they his children and his heirs.—It shall be known to the isles afar off, that he careth for his chosen people: and if he suffer them to be scattered, he will gather and keep them, as a shepherd does his flock: by price and by power, he has ransomed and redeemed them from those enemies who were stronger than they; and he will maintain and perfect their deliverance, and not let any “pluck them out of his hand.” (Notes, John x. 10—13. 26—31.) To his courts they “flow together,” (Is. ii. 2.) that they may share and celebrate his goodness: and while he supplies all their outward wants, their souls become fruitful and cheerful “as “a watered garden.” Their sorrows shall terminate in joy; and their comforts are earnest of eternal felicity in that world, where “they shall not sorrow any more at “all,” but both ministers and people shall be “satisfied “with the goodness of the LORD.”—But while the believer has “a joy, that a stranger intermeddleth not with;” he must in the world expect tribulations: and a voice of lamentation often interrupts that of thanksgiving, even “in the dwellings of the righteous.” (Note, 1 Pet. i. 6, 7.) But, if bereaving providences, or heavy afflictions, cause the Christian such bitter mourning, that he “refuses to be “comforted;” it must be considered as his infirmity. We ought not to mourn over our children and relatives, as if “they were not,” should they be removed from us; but, having used the proper means for promoting their future felicity, we should leave them with our righteous and merciful God. He graciously comforts those who are cast down, and bids his mourners dry their tears; for both their sorrows and labours shall be recompensed: and if we have “hope in our end,” for ourselves and those belonging to us, concerning an eternal inheritance, all temporal afflictions will be tolerable and beneficial.

The true penitent reflects with shame and contrition on his former obstinacy and rebellion, and on his misconduct under afflictions, as well as his abuse of mercies: for he knows that he has often suffered in vain, and has been as untractable as the “bullock unaccustomed to the yoke.” Once he excused his sins; but now he is sensible of his ingratitude and folly: he is convinced that he must be made a new creature, in order to serve God and enjoy his favour; he feels the power of inbred sin, evil habits, and strong temptations; and perceives that he cannot now create his own heart: thus he learns to value the promises of sanctifying grace, and to plead them in prayer, crying to the Lord, “Turn thou me, and I shall be turned;” “Convert me, or I shall never be converted.” His prayers will be answered, he will be more and more abased and humbled; and increasing instruction will lead him to “abhor himself,” and to remember with shame the sins, which were “the reproach of his youth,” and the effects of which he has perhaps still to struggle with. (Notes, Job xiii. 24—28, v. 26. xlii. 1—6. Ez. xvi. 60—63, v. 63.) This may, or may not, be accompanied with terror: but it will surely be attended with submission to the justice of God in all his corrections and threatenings, an entire reliance on his mercy and grace, and newness of life. Where this change is effected, (whether in the case of a new convert, or of a returning backslider,) the Lord will treat him as a beloved child, “in whom he greatly delighteth,” and “will surely have mercy on him;” he will pity his sorrows and terrors, as a father does those of his son, whom he loves and corrects; and will remember him with the most tender compassions. (Notes, Prov. iii. 11, 12. Heb. xii. 4—13.)—He is, of his own clemency, disposed to this kindness; and in that “new thing, that he hath created “in the earth,” in the Virgin’s Son, the glorious Prince of Peace, the great Immanuel, he has made way for the honourable exercise of his mercy to the chief of sinners. Let then poor prodigals, who are “come to themselves,” no longer wander about, as ashamed or afraid to return to their Father’s house; let them “set their hearts to the “highway” which he has cast up; let them “return to “the LORD, and he will have mercy on them;” and then let them direct and encourage others in the same salutary course.—Thus men return to Zion, and are enrolled her citizens; and all who profess to worship our God in Christ, and on his mercy-seat, should remember that his church is “the habitation of righteousness, and the mountain of “holiness:” as such, they should still pray for her prosperity, and that they may be a credit and ornament to her, by their holy examples. He has yet a remnant, both of pastors and of flocks, who answer this description; and he still continues to “satisfy the weary, and replenish the “sorrowful soul.” Having tasted his grace, hoping for his glory, and looking forward to the happy event of all our troubles, and those of the whole family of Christ; our thoughts even at the hour of death may be pleasant, by reflecting on what we shall shortly awake to behold and enjoy. For the Lord will still watch over his people and purify his church. No man shall finally perish, but for his own sins; nor any sinner, who is cordially willing to accept of Christ’s salvation.

V. 31—40.

Blessed be God for his new covenant, and for that new dispensation under which we live! But let us not trust to the outward administration of it; which will stand us in no more stead, than the Sinai-covenant did Israel, except the law be written in our hearts, as the principle of genuine repentance, faith, and cheerful obedience. This alone can prove that we are the true people of God; and that we know the Father and the Son, by the teaching of the Holy Spirit, and that all our sins are blotted out, to be remembered no more for ever. This circumcision and regeneration of the heart seals to the Christian “the righteousness “of faith,” and evidences that he is Christ’s, and has peace with God through him: and the power which formed the heavenly orbs, and continues them for lights to the earth, and which divide the sea, or stills it, when the waves thereof roar, will keep him through faith unto salvation. The personal happiness of every true believer is secured by that promise, covenant, and oath, which assure us, that “the gates of hell shall not prevail against the church.” This his love is immeasurable, and passeth knowledge; it can only be apprehended by faith and experience: and to those who thus apprehend it, every present mercy is a pledge and earnest of their complete and eternal salvation.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXII. V. 1—3. (Notes, xxv. 1. xxxvii. 11—21. xxxviii. 1—6.) Jeremiah was shut up in the court of the prison, to prevent him from publicly delivering his predictions; but it does not appear that he was at first put to further hardship, or that his friends were excluded from him,—Zedekiah and his princes were desperately resolved to hold out to the last extremity, not only against

4 And ^h Zedekiah king of Judah shall not escape out of the hand of the Chaldeans, but shall surely be delivered into the hand of the king of Babylon, and shall speak with him mouth to mouth, and his eyes shall behold his eyes;

5 And he shall lead Zedekiah to Babylon, and there shall he be ⁱ until I visit him, saith the LORD: ^k though ye fight with the Chaldeans, ye shall not prosper.

6 ¶ And Jeremiah said, The word of the LORD came unto me, saying,

7 ⁱ Behold, Hanameel the son of Shallum, thine uncle, shall come unto thee, saying, Buy thee my field that is in ^m Anathoth: "for the right of redemption is thine to buy it.

8 So Hanameel mine uncle's son came to me in the ^o court of the prison, according to the word of the LORD, and said unto me, Buy my field, I pray thee, that is ^p in Anathoth, which is in the country of Benjamin: for the right of inheritance is thine, and the redemption is thine; buy it for thyself.

9 Then I knew that this was the word of the LORD.

10 And I bought the field of Hanameel my uncle's son, that was in Anathoth, and ^r weighed him the money, even ^s seventeen shekels of silver.

11 And ^t I subscribed the evidence, ^u and sealed it, ^v and took witnesses, and weighed him the money in the balances.

12 So I took the evidence of the purchase, both that which was sealed ^w according to the law and custom, and that which was open.

13 And I gave the evidence of the purchase unto ^y Baruch the son of ^z Neriah, the son of Maaseiah, in the sight of Hanameel mine uncle's son, ^a and in the presence of the witnesses that subscribed the book of the purchase, before all the Jews that sat in the court of the prison.

14 And I charged Baruch before them, saying,

15 Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; ^b Take these evidences, this evidence of the purchase, both which is sealed, and this evidence which is open; and put them in an earthen vessel, that they may continue many days:

16 For thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; ^c Houses, and fields, and vineyards shall be possessed again in this land.

the superior power of the Chaldeans, but in defiance of the word of God: and Jeremiah must be silenced, or he would discourage the people by his predictions.

V. 4, 5. (Notes, xxxiv. 1—5. 2 Kings xxv. 6, 7. Ez. xii. 8—16.)—Visit, &c. (5) 'In his posterity, whom I will restore to their own country.' Lowth. Zedekiah's sons were slain before his eyes; his daughters were carried by Johanan the son of Kareah into Egypt, and never returned. (xli. 10. xliii. 6.) No individual of his posterity is mentioned in scripture: (Note, xxii. 28—30:) so that the visitation of death seems to be exclusively meant.—Till I take Zedekiah away by death; for he shall not die by the sword.'

V. 6—15. The prophet was fully assured that the city and temple would soon be levelled with the ground; and all the rest of the land was even at that time in the possession of the Chaldeans: yet the Lord made it known to him, that his uncle's son would come to him to sell him a field; and as he was the next in succession, to whom the right of redemption belonged, he commanded him to purchase it. (Notes, Lev. xxv. 25—34.) Accordingly Hanameel came on this business.—During the famine that prevailed in the city, Hanameel probably wanted money to buy bread, and his field would not be thought of much value in such circumstances, which may account for the stipulated sum being so very small; for probably it was not much more than forty shillings. It is not known, whether this land was a part of the possessions of the priests, in the suburbs of Anathoth, or some other small estate in the neighbourhood, which had come into the family: nor is this of any importance; for the thing signified, not the sign, was chiefly to be noticed. The prophet himself could derive no advantage from the field, nor any relation who was nearer to him than Hanameel himself; and it might be very inconvenient to him to part even with so small a sum, in his difficult circumstances: but he knew that it was the word of the LORD, and he implicitly obeyed it. By remaining unmarried, (Note, xvi. 2—4,) he assured the people, that he was satisfied of the truth of his predictions respecting the captivity; and by thus buying the field he proved the same, as to his predictions of their restoration.—The transaction being settled, according to the law and custom of the time, with great punctuality, would give it notoriety: and his orders to his companion Baruch, to put the deeds into an earthen vessel, which would not be so liable to decay, if buried in the ground, as a vessel of wood or iron; would cause the annexed reason to be the more noticed and remembered.—These deeds Baruch must secure in some place, where they might be found at the end of many days.

V. 16. The prophet seems to have been greatly perplexed, at comparing the command just given, with the dispensations of Providence, and the predictions which he had been sent to deliver. The whole appeared most wonderful to him: but he knew that it was not so before God; because "known unto him are all his works from the "beginning of the world," and "he worketh all things "after the counsel of his own will." And his prayer implied, though it did not expressly contain, a petition for further satisfaction on the subject.

V. 25. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.) The prophet seems to have been greatly disquieted when he reflected on this transaction. Perhaps he still indulged a hope, that the city might be spared; or he feared, that the people would put this construction on his conduct. But having stayed his mind on the perfections of God, and on his sovereignty and wonderful works for Israel, and expressed himself as one assured, that he was righteous in all his judgments; he concluded with intimating his difficulties. There was every appearance, that the Chaldeans would speedily succeed in their attempt; yet the Lord ordered him to buy the field, with great exactness about the witnesses and the deas, though the city was given into the hand of their enemies: and what could be the design of such orders?

27 Behold, I am the LORD, 'the God of all flesh: ^gis there any thing too hard for me?

28 Therefore thus saith the LORD; ^hBehold, I will give this city into the hand of the Chaldeans, and into the hand of Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon, and he shall take it:

29 And the Chaldeans, that fight against this city, shall come ⁱand set fire on this city, and burn it, with the houses, ^kupon whose roofs they have offered incense unto Baal, and poured out drink-offerings unto other gods, to provoke me to anger.

30 For ^lthe children of Israel, and the children of Judah have only done evil before me ^mfrom their youth: for the children of Israel have only provoked me to anger with the work of their hands, saith the LORD.

31 For ⁿthis city hath been to me as ^aa provocation of mine anger and of my fury, from the day that they built it, even unto this day; ^othat I should remove it from before my face,

32 Because of all the evil of the children of Israel and of the children of Judah, which they have done to provoke me to anger, ^pthey, their kings, their princes, their priests, and their prophets, and the men of Judah, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem.

33 And they have ^qturned unto me ^rthe ^tback, and not the face: though I taught them, ^rrising up early and teaching them, yet they have not hearkened to receive instruction:

34 But they ^sset their abominations in the house, which is called by my name, to defile it;

35 And ^tthey built the high places of Baal, which are in the valley of the son of Hinnom, to cause their sons and their daughters to pass through the fire unto Molech; ^uwhich I commanded them not, neither came it into my mind, that they should do this abomination, ^xto cause Judah to sin.

36 ¶ And ^ynow therefore thus saith the LORD, the God of Israel, concerning this city, whereof ye say, ^zIt shall be delivered into the hand of the king of Babylon, by the sword, and by the famine, and by the pestilence;

37 Behold, ^aI will gather them out of all countries, whither I have driven them in mine anger, and in my fury, and in great wrath; and I will bring them again unto this place, ^band I will cause them to dwell safely.

V. 39—41. These verses might have some reference to the revival of religion, which took place after the captivity: but immensely greater and more durable blessings were evidently intended. The introduction of the gospel-dispensation, the conversion of many of the Jews to Christ; their union with each other, and with the Gentile converts, in the worship of God; and especially the future conversion of Israel as a nation, must be implied in the prophetic meaning. (Notes, l. 4—6. Ez. xxxvii. 15—22. Zeph. iii. 9, 10. Acts. iv. 32—35.)—The character and privileges, however, of all true Christians are also described. By regeneration the Lord gives them "one heart," that is, one judgment and disposition. They often differ in things of inferior consequence, through remaining ignorance, sin, and temptation: but in the more important matters, which respect the divine perfections, and the glory and harmony of them; the evil of sin, and the lost estate of fallen man; the way of salvation through the divine Saviour, and his merits and grace; the nature and excellency of holiness; their obligations to love and serve God; the vanity of the world, and the importance of eternal things; they are "all of one mind and judgment." (Note, Eph. iv. 1—6.) And they are all disposed to repentance, faith in Christ, and love to him and their brethren; to hate sin, and to worship and obey the Lord. Union and communion with God in Christ, and conformity to him, produce congeniality of spirit with each other: so that, as far as they are under the influence of divine grace, they are all "of one heart and soul," and disposed to associate and worship together; as children of one family, soldiers of one army, or travellers in one journey. (Notes, 1 Cor. xii. 12—31. Eph. ii. 19—22. Phil. ii. 1—4.)—They have likewise, all of them, access to God, and acceptance with him in "one Way," even through Jesus Christ; and they habitually walk in the one "way of holiness" which he has marked out to them. (Notes, Is. xxxv. 8—10. John xiv. 6.) These blessings are conferred on them, that they may "fear," reverence, worship, and obey God through life; and that a succession of persons, bearing this character and enjoying these blessings, may be preserved on earth to the end of the world. This is for their present and future good, and for that of "their children after them;" who, being trained up under the ordinances of God, have invaluable advantages above others, and are generally made partakers of the same grace with their parents, when properly educated. (Notes, Gen. xvii. 7, 8. xviii. 17—19. Acts ii. 37—40.) With these persons God makes "an everlasting covenant," and secures to them the enjoyment of the promised blessings. He engages never to "turn away from them," so as to cease "to do them good," and to prevent the effects of their own inconstancy and depravity, by "putting his fear into their hearts that they may not depart from him." (Notes, xxxi. 33, 34. 2 Sam. xxiii. 5. Is. lv. 1—3. Heb. xiii. 20, 21.) So that when love declines, and they grow unwatchful, or are tempted to sin; fear revives, they begin to tremble for the consequences, and are thus led to renewed repentance, faith, prayer, watchfulness, and obedience. Thus they cannot forfeit the promised blessings; for the Lord engages for their part in the covenant, as well as for his own. (Notes, John x. 26—31. Rom. viii. 28. 39. 1 Pet. i. 2—5.) He will therefore assuredly "rejoice over them to do them good, with his whole heart and soul," for the glory of his name; and will bring them to heaven, even as he restored the captive Jews to the land of Canaan. (Notes, Is. lxii. 1—5. Zeph. iii. 14—20. Luke xv. 8—10. 22—24.)

Plant. (41) The re-establishment of Israel and Judah in Canaan, and their union as one nation, after their conversion to Christ, is here, as well as in many other places, most clearly and emphatically predicted. (Notes, 37, 38. Am. ix. 13—15.)

V. 42—44. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Deut. xxx. 1—10. Josh. xxiii. 14—16.) 'The return of their captivity under Cyrus, shall be an earnest of those greater blessings. I will bestow on them at their general restoration.'

Predictions concerning the return of the Jews from captivity; the rebuilding of Jerusalem; and the pardon, holiness, comfort, and prosperity connected with those events, 1—13: concerning the coming of Christ; and the performance of the covenant-engagements of God to the Levites, and to David, in him, 14—26.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—25.

The judgments of God often come gradually upon sinners; but always without fail, when not prevented by timely repentance.—Those, who harden their hearts against the warnings of his word, will hate and persecute such as faithfully declare them. But if God be for us, we need not fear the power of any adversary: and they, who fight against him, can never prosper in resisting the executioners of his vengeance.—Ministers should, in their whole conduct, exhibit an example of implicit obedience to God, and evince that they really believe the doctrines which they teach others: they should appear disinterested, and attentive to every relative duty. They must not entangle themselves in the affairs of this life: and in needful secular concerns, they should act with punctuality and exactness; avoiding “all appearance of evil,” and precluding, as far as possible, all occasions of contention to survivors.—Earthly inheritances are in reality never of very great value: but in times of heavy publick calamities, and in the hour of death, they begin to appear in their real insignificance; and in the same interesting seasons men begin to form a more proper estimate of the value of an inheritance in heaven. This consideration should direct our habitual judgment and conduct.—Whatever creates perplexity should lead us to “the throne of grace:” and though we must not hesitate to obey God, when we do not perceive the reasons of his commandments; yet we should seek increasing light, that our obedience may be more intelligent. (Note, xii. 1—4.)—When we cannot understand any particular providential dispensations, we may profitably recur to first and general principles. We are sure that nothing can be too hard for the Creator of the world; that “the Judge of all the earth will do right;” and that the Saviour of sinners cannot be defective in goodness and mercy. If then “the LORD recompense the iniquities of the fathers into the bosom of their children after them;” we may be sure, that it consists with his justice: and if he suffer his people to be afflicted by their enemies; it must be the result of his wisdom, truth, and mercy. Whatever he promises or threatens he can easily effect: for “he is great in counsel and mighty in operation; and his eyes are open upon all the ways of the sons of men, to give to every one according to his doings.” The works, which he has wrought for the salvation of his people, and the ruin of his enemies, and to make his name glorious, should be considered as so many specimens of his general conduct, and demonstrations that he will perform his whole word.—Alas! how many are there, who enjoy his providential bounties, and the means of grace in abundance, who will not obey his voice; nay, will do nothing of all that he has commanded them to do! Therefore evil comes upon them: and, when suffering the punishment of their sins, they will remember that “thus it was “written, and thus it must be.” (Notes, Mark ix. 43—50. Luke xvi. 24—26.)

V. 26—44.

When we have meditated, with prayer and praise, on the divine perfections and conduct, and have referred to him those things which troubled us; we shall frequently find our minds composed and satisfied, even before we have received a solution of our difficulties: and the Lord will make known to his people his will, as far as their duty and peace are concerned. But he is of one mind, and his purposes are irreversible: he will relax nothing of his requirements, nor at all mitigate the sentence denounced against the impenitent.—When the authority, influence, or example of ungodly men causes others to commit abomination; and when peculiar advantages for instruction are neglected and abused, the wrath of God will burn fiercely against the transgressors. But, though the misconduct of numberless multitudes has, from the beginning, made even his visible church “a provocation of his anger,” he will not forsake it: but, having destroyed the rebels from among his chosen remnant, he will gather them from all places into his fold, and “cause them to dwell safely.” To those who are indeed his people, and who have “the LORD for their God,” he “giveth one heart and one way,” that they may be like minded with himself and each other; their filial fear and reverential worship do not mar the exercise of their grateful love and joy, but concur in producing active and watchful obedience: this is as much for their good as for his glory, and entails the most valuable blessings on their posterity. Let us seek an interest in these precious promises, and rest in nothing short of them: let us remember that unity of heart and worship among Christians comes from the Spirit of God, and discord from sin and Satan; and let us “endeavour to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace.” Let us diligently seek “the good of our children after us,” and “bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord.” Let us earnestly come to Christ, and constantly use the means of grace: thus we shall know, that “the everlasting covenant is made with us,” and that the Lord will neither turn from us, nor leave us to depart from him. But it is his plan to preserve his people, by “putting his fear into their hearts:” a confidence therefore, that is never shaken by fear, even when disgraced by sin, is greatly to be suspected of being a groundless presumption; and some trembling Christians have better evidence of their safety, than they can be made to perceive. But we should be careful not to persuade men to a degree of confidence above their experience, diligence, conscientiousness, and simplicity; for this counteracts the plan of our God and Saviour. They, who are interested in the covenant, will in due time have the comfort of it. The LORD “will rejoice over them to do them good;” he will delight that “nothing is too hard for him,” and that he can make the objects of his love as happy as he pleases:

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXIII. V. 1, 2. (Note, xxxii. 1—3.)—Maker, &c. (2) This may either refer to the creation and establishment of the earth; or to the formation and establishment of the church, of which Jerusalem was a type. The Lord had formed and established that holy city, and he would renew his mercies to her. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.)

V. 3. Jeremiah had prayed; and, in answer to his prayers, had received gracious intimations of manifold blessings in reserve for Israel, yet connected with plain declarations that his intercession would not prevail for averting the impending judgments: but he was encouraged still to call on the LORD, who promised to reveal to him yet more glorious things, which hitherto he had not been acquainted with, or in a very imperfect manner. (Notes, xiv. 10—12. xv. 1. xxix. 10—14.) The verse may, however, be understood as an encouragement to the church, or to Israel as a nation, to call upon God for the blessings afterwards predicted. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.)

V. 4. Mounts, &c.] Either battering rams, or engines from which to throw stones. (Note, xxxii. 16—25, v. 24.)

V. 5. The allies who came to assist the Jews, or the Jews themselves, effected nothing by resisting the Chaldeans, except the prolongation and increase of their own miseries: whilst their houses were filled with the dead bodies of such, as the Lord slew by famine, pestilence, and the sword. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6—9. (Notes, xvii. 14. xxx. 2, 3. 12—18. Hos. vi. 1—3.) All human efforts, to close the wounds and heal the maladies of Zion, only made them worse: but in due time the Lord intended to apply effectual remedies; to re-establish her civil and ecclesiastical state; and to make known to her inhabitants the abundance of his mercy in being reconciled to them, of peace and prosperity to be found in his service, and of his truth in performing his promises. For he meant to cleanse them from both the pollution and guilt of their sins: and then they would be an accepted, holy, and happy people, in whom he would delight, and be glorified, in the sight of the nations; who would be filled with astonishment and consternation, lest the power which had so prospered Israel, should punish them for their enmity and injuries against them. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Ex. xv. 14—16. Neh. vi. 16, 17. Esth. vi. 12, 13. Is. lxii. 6, 7. 2 Thes. i. 8—10.)—As the return of “the captivity of Israel,” as well as of Judah, is predicted; future events, respecting the nation of Israel, will form a more signal accomplishment than any which has hitherto taken place.

Abundance, &c. (6) This word is differently rendered; but not so as materially to affect the meaning.—“I will reveal to them the door of repentance.” Targum. “I will grant their prayer for peace and truth.” Blayney.—An abundant answer to prayer seems to be meant. (Acts xi. 18. xiv. 2. 7.)

13 In the cities of the mountains, in the cities of the vale, and in the cities of the south, and in the land of Benjamin, and in the places about Jerusalem, and in the cities of Judah, shall the flocks pass again under the hands of him that telleth them, saith the LORD.

14 ¶ Behold, 'the days come, saith the LORD, that I will perform that good thing, which I have promised unto the house of Israel, and to the house of Judah.

15 In those days, and at that time, will I cause ^b the Branch of righteous-

(in the midst of the dire calamities, to which the Jews were at this time subjected,) of that joyful song of praise, which had been so often used to express the lively gratitude and admiring love of the most eminent saints, in the most prosperous times, is peculiarly striking; especially as connected with the joy expressed, during prosperity, in the common concerns of life, and shewing, that these also would be conducted with a hearty regard to the will and glory of God. (Notes, xxv. 10. xxxii. 36—44. 1 Chr. xvi. 34—36. 2 Chr. xx. 20, 21. V. 14—16. (See on Note, xxiii. 5, 6.) In the passage referred to, "The LORD our Righteousness" is given as the name of the Messiah; but here the church is thus called. The privilege, in which above all other she glories, is, that JEHOVAH is her Righteousness: and this is the peculiarity, which distinguishes true believers from all other persons on earth. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. 1s. lxi. 10, 11. lxii. 10—12.)—The words, however, are more literally rendered in an old translation, favoured by many eminently learned men; "and he, who shall call her," (to be his peculiar people)

"is the LORD our Righteousness." All the righteousness of the faithful, both their justification and sanctification, is derived from him. Lowth.

V. 17, 18. Christ is both the King and High Priest of his church: in him the covenant of royalty made with David and his seed, and that of priesthood made with Aaron and his seed and brethren, received their full completion: and all the sacrifices of that dispensation were superseded by his "one oblation of himself," the efficacy of which remains for ever. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, 2 Sam. vii. 12—16, v. 16. Ps. lxxxix. 19—37, vv. 29, 36. cx. 1. 4. Zech. vi. 12, 13. Luke i. 26—33. Heb. vii.) But the continuance of a regular ministry among Christians, and the privileges of believers, who are "a royal priesthood," under Christ the High Priest, seem also to be predicted: (Marg. Ref. g.—Notes, 1 Pet. ii. 4—6. 9, 10. Rev. i. 4—6, v. 6. v. 8—10, v. 10 :) and in this latter sense it is afterwards said (22), that the seed of David and the Levites would be multiplied as the sand of the sea. (Notes, 1s. lxi. 4—6, v. 6. lxvi. 19—23, v. 21.)—Probably, a more literal accomplishment will hereafter be witnessed: but I do not presume to state particularly the events which may be expected.

V. 23—26. (See on Notes, 17—22. xxxii. 42—44.) Despised, &c. (24) The Jews despised the privilege of being the people of God, when they were driven out of Canaan for their sins; and the nations despised them, as if no more to be a people: but the Lord intended to restore them from their captivity, to raise up Christ among them; and at length to re-instate the seed of Israel in their own land, and in all their distinguished privileges; and thus in all respects to perform the mercy promised to their fathers.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13.

Our gracious God more values, favours, and honours his faithful servants in a prison, than ungodly princes on their thrones, or hypocritical priests in the temple: and his presence and consolations can make any situation pleasant.—He, who created and upholds the earth, forms and establishes the church; and no power can prevail against him.—All blessings must be sought by fervent prayer, which the Lord never fails to answer. The trembling sinner, when he begins to “call upon God,” soon discovers and experiences such glory and blessedness, as before he could not have conceived. And as the believer continues to pour out his prayers and supplications, in his own behalf, and that of others, near and afar off; he is led further and further in the same way, and finds in every thing, that God is “able to do exceeding abundantly for him, above all that he can ask or think.” (Note, Eph. iii. 20, 21.) But when the saint shall arrive in heaven, what great, what glorious, what “hidden things” will be shewn him, when he shall see the divine Saviour as he is, be made like him, and “know even as he is known!”—When sinners are suffering under divine corrections, or trembling for fear of the wrath to come; they only increase and prolong their miseries, by delaying to submit to God: but when they cast themselves unreservedly on his mercy, he brings “health and cure” to their souls, and “reveals “to them the abundance of peace and truth.” His sanctifying grace and pardoning mercy are inseparably connected: he certainly pardons all whom he cleanses; and cleanses all whom he pardons: they who are thus “washed, “and sanctified, and justified, in the name of the Lord “Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God,” are enabled to walk before him in peace and purity; and he “takes pleasure “in them,” and “is glorified by them” and in his goodness to them, before those “that are without.” Many are thus led to perceive a real difference between the people

25 Thus saith the LORD; ° If my covenant be not with day and night, ° and if I have not appointed the ordinances of heaven and earth;

26 Then will I cast away ° the seed of Jacob, and David my servant, so that I will not take any of his seed to be rulers over the seed of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob: for ° I will cause their captivity to return, ° and have mercy on them.

of God, and the world around them; and to fear his wrath for their enmity against those whom he “delighteth “to honour.” Thus they tremble at the view of the prosperity and joy of believers, and are led to enquire after his salvation, and at length to partake of it; while others are over-awed, and kept from doing them further injury.—The Lord will hide his face from his people for their sins; yet he will return to repair the desolations of his church: and, notwithstanding interruptions, “the voice of joy and “thanksgiving shall be heard in the dwellings of the right-“eous.” Whilst they praise him for his everlasting mercy, they cannot but rejoice in him; and their sacrifices of praise are highly acceptable and honourable to him, when presented in the name of his beloved Son. (Notes, Col. iii. 16, 17. Heb. xiii. 15, 16. 1 Pet. iv. 9—11.)—Where he gives righteousness and peace, he will supply all temporal wants: and our relations and possessions will be comfortable to us, in proportion as they are “sanctified by the “word of God and prayer,” and improved as talents to his glory, and the benefit of our brethren and neighbours.

When the Lord's time comes, he will “perform every “good thing” which he hath promised to his church: and, as he fulfilled his word, in giving his Son to be the sacrifice for our sins and “the LORD our Righteousness,” who was emphatically “that Good thing promised to the house of “Israel,” it would be the most inexcusable incredulity, to question the performance of any of his other engagements. Through this our righteous King, who reigns on the throne of David, and is our High “Priest upon his “throne,” let us bring our spiritual “sacrifices continually, giving thanks” to our God and Father by him. Let us pray, that the royal priesthood may be multiplied, as the sand of the sea: and, in order to this, that able and faithful ministers may be sent forth into every place, to call sinners to the knowledge of salvation, and to excite his people to glorify God with their lips and in their lives. Whilst we value our privileges, as the people of God, let us not despise those families, which were of old his chosen, though for a time they seem to be cast off: for as he has appointed the ordinances of heaven and earth, and the sun and moon know their appointed seasons; so surely will he cause their captivity to return, and have mercy on them: and as he, who rules over the whole spiritual seed of Abraham, sprang from that nation according to the flesh; he will deem his honour concerned in bringing them again into his church, and restoring them to their former privileges. (Notes, Rom. xi. 1—6. 11—32.)

CHAP. XXXIV.

The prophet is sent to assure Zedekiah, that the city will certainly be taken and burned; and that he will be carried to Babylon, and there die in peace, 1—7. The princes and people, having covenanted to set free their enslaved brethren, again reduce them to bondage, 8—11. God by the prophet proclaims liberty to the sword, pestilence, and famine; and predicts the return and success of the Chaldeans, 12—22.

THE word which came unto Jeremiah from the LORD, ^awhen Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, and all his army, and ^ball the kingdoms of the earth ^cof his dominion, and all the people, fought against Jerusalem, and against all the cities thereof, saying,

2 Thus saith the LORD, the God of Israel; ^eGo, and speak to Zedekiah king of Judah, and tell him, Thus saith the LORD; ^dBehold, I will give this city into the hand of the king of Babylon, and he shall burn it with fire.

3 And ^ethou shalt not escape out of his hand, but shalt surely be taken, and delivered into his hand; ^fand thine eyes shall behold the eyes of the king of Babylon, and ^ghe shall speak with thee mouth to mouth, and thou shalt go to Babylon.

4 Yet hear the word of the LORD, O Zedekiah king of Judah; Thus saith the LORD of thee, Thou shalt not die by the sword;

5 But ^hthou shalt die in peace: ⁱand with the burnings of thy fathers, the former kings which were before thee, so shall they burn odours for thee; ^jand they will lament thee, saying, Ah, lord! for I have pronounced the word, saith the LORD.

6 Then Jeremiah the prophet ^kspake all these words unto Zedekiah king of Judah in Jerusalem,

7 When the king of Babylon's army fought ^kagainst Jerusalem, and against all the cities of Judah that were left, against ^lLachish, and against Azekah: ^mfor these defenced cities remained of the cities of Judah.

8 ¶ This is the word that came unto Jeremiah from the LORD, after that the king Zedekiah ⁿhad made a covenant with all the people which were at Jerusalem, ^oto proclaim liberty unto them;

9 That every man should let his man-servant, and every man his maid-servant, being ^pan Hebrew or an Hebrewess, go free; that none should ^qserve himself of them, to wit, of a Jew his brother.

10 Now ^rwhen all the princes, and all the people, which had entered into the covenant, heard that every one should let his man-servant, and every one his maid-servant, go free, that none should serve themselves of them any more, ^sthen they obeyed and let them go.

11 But ^tafterward they turned, and caused the servants and the handmaids, whom they had let go free, to return, and brought them into subjection for servants and for handmaids.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXIV. V. 1—5. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, xxxii. 4, 5. Ez. xxiv. 1, 2.) Zedekiah was at this time assured by the prophet, who was sent to him expressly with this message from God, that he should be taken prisoner and carried captive, notwithstanding all his efforts to defend himself, or to escape by flight; that he should see the king of Babylon, and hear his words; and that he should go to Babylon. (Notes, xxi. 4—10. 2 Kings xxv. 1—7. Ez. xii. 8—15, vv. 10—13. xvii. 15—21.) But he was also informed that he would not be slain in battle, or die a violent death; but die in peace according to the course of nature. Perhaps he was also brought to repentance, and died at peace with God. It was, however, foretold that the Jews would shew him the same respect, which had been usually paid to the kings of Judah after their decease; and lament, that in his days the measure of their national iniquity was completed, and the family of David reduced so low; though he was not so desperately wicked, as some of his predecessors had been. (Notes, xxii. 13—19, vv. 18, 19. 2 Chr. xvi. 13, 14. xxi. 18—20. Lam. iv. 20.)—It is not known at what time Zedekiah died.

V. 6, 7. (Marg. Ref.) All the other fortified cities had at this time been taken by Nebuchadnezzar. It is probable, that for delivering this message to Zedekiah, the prophet was shut up in the court of the prison. (Note, xxxii. 1—3.)

V. 8—11. (Notes, Ex. xxi. 2—6. Lev. xxv. 8—13. 39—46. Deut. xv. 9, 10.)—The Jews in general seem to have paid no regard to the divine law, in freeing their brethren who had become slaves, after they had served seven years. But when Jerusalem was straitened by the Chaldeans, the king, perhaps excited by Jeremiah, entered into a solemn covenant with the people, to set at liberty all

12 Therefore the word of the LORD came to Jeremiah from the LORD, saying, 13 Thus saith the LORD, the God of Israel; "I made a covenant with your fathers, * in the day that I brought them forth out of the land of Egypt, ^y out of the house of bondmen, saying,

14 At ^z the end of seven years let ye go every man his brother an Hebrew, which hath * been sold unto thee; and when he hath served thee six years, thou shalt let him go free from thee: ^a but your fathers hearkened not unto me, neither inclined their ear.

15 And ^b ye were [†] now turned, and had done right in my sight, ^c in proclaiming liberty every man to his neighbour; ^d and ye had made a covenant before me, in the house [†] which is called by my name:

16 But ^e ye turned, and ^f polluted my name, and caused every man his servant, and every man his hand-maid, whom he had set at liberty at their pleasure, to return, and brought them into subjection, to be unto you for servants and for handmaids.

17 Therefore thus saith the LORD; Ye have not hearkened unto me, in proclaiming liberty every one to his brother, and every man to his neighbour: ^g behold, I proclaim a liberty for you, saith the LORD, ^h to the sword, to the pestilence, and to the famine; and ⁱ I will make you ^j to be removed into all the kingdoms of the earth.

18 And I will give the men that ^k have transgressed my covenant, which have not performed the words of the covenant which they had made before me, ^l when they cut the calf in twain, and passed between the parts thereof;

19 The ^m princes of Judah, and the princes of Jerusalem, ⁿ the eunuchs, and the priests, and all the people of the land, which passed between the parts of the calf;

20 I will even give them into the hand of their enemies, ^o and into the hand of them that seek their life: ^p and their dead bodies shall be for meat unto their Hebrew slaves: and it was proclaimed that none of them, on any pretence, should thus illegally use the service of their brethren; and accordingly the law was in this respect complied with. But when Pharaoh's army came out of Egypt to assist them, and the Chaldeans had left the siege of Jerusalem to go and meet them; (21) xxxvii. 1—5;) thinking the danger was over, they impiously violated their solemn covenant, and, with the most cruel injustice, reduced to slavery the very persons, to whom they had just before given freedom. (Marg. Ref.)—Proclaim, &c. (8) Note, Is. lxi. 1—3.

Princes. (10) 'The verse may be thus translated, "All " the princes... consented, that every one should let his " man-servant... go free: they consented, I say, and let " them go." Lowth.

V. 12—14. The law of liberating Hebrew slaves, at the end of seven years, was an express condition of the national covenant. (Notes, Ex. xix. 5. xxi. 2—6. xxiv. 3—8. Deut. xv. 13—15. Neh. v. 1—5. Is. lviii. 5—12.) 'The seventh year was the year of release, (Deut. xv. 9.) 'consequently servants were to continue in service but six ' years, and at the beginning of the seventh were to ' be let go free. ... "At the end of three years, thou shalt " bring forth all the tithe, &c." "The third year is the " year of tithing." (Deut. xiv. 28. xxvi. 12.) So Christ ' is said to "rise again after three days," (Mark viii. 31.) ' which is elsewhere explained by his rising on the third ' day.' Lowth.—It is generally supposed, that the slaves should have been set at liberty on each sabbatical year: but in that case many of them would have served far less than six years; and this is not mentioned, either in the law of liberating slaves, or in that of keeping the sabbatical year. 'The year of Jubilee was to be a time of general release: '...but that the sabbatical year was so, I see not the least ' reason to conclude; but quite the contrary.' Blayney. It is, however, likely the observation of it was commonly attended by giving liberty to slaves, as well as a release of insolvent debtors; and that the transaction here recorded was on a sabbatical year, though the calculations of learned men on that subject are very far from satisfactory. (Note, 2 Chr. xxxvi. 21.)

V. 15, 16. The transaction, which had taken place, was a most solemn covenant made at the temple in the name of the LORD; so that the violation of it "polluted his " name," and was a most atrocious act of perjury, or "taking the name of God in vain." (Notes, Ex. xx. 7. 2 Kings xi. 17—20. xxiii. 3. Neh. ix. 36—38. x. 29—39.)

V. 17. The Lord gave and proclaimed liberty to these dire judgments to seize upon the Jews: he cast them out of his protection, and left them exposed to every kind of misery. 'Calamities come upon men by direction and ' commission from God [to other men], as the executioners of his justice.' Lowth. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xlvii. 6, 7. Ez. xiv. 13—21, v. 21.)

V. 18, 19. (Notes, Gen. xv. 9, 10. 17.) This ceremony of dividing the sacrifice, and passing between the parts of it, implied an imprecation on the persons covenanting, if they brake their engagement, that they might be thus cut asunder, and made a sacrifice to divine justice.

THE word, which came unto Jeremiah from the LORD, ^a in the days of Jehoiakim the son of Josiah king of Judah, saying,

2 Go unto ^b the house of the Rechabites, and speak unto them, and bring them into the house of the LORD, ^c into one of the chambers, and give them wine to drink.

3 Then I took Jaazaniah the son of Jeremiah, the son of Habaziniah, and his brethren, and all his sons, and the whole house of the Rechabites;

4 And I brought them into the house of the LORD, ^d into the chamber of the sons of Hanan, the son of Ig-daliah, ^e a man of God, which was by the chamber of ^f the princes, which was above the chamber of Maaseiah the son of Shallum, ^g the keeper of the ^{*} door.

to violate them. But if men repent of their repentance, God will repent of his forbearance: "they shall have judgment without mercy, who have shewed no mercy;" and they, who will not obey God in their conduct towards such as they have been accustomed to oppress, will be cast out of his protection, and exposed to his temporal and eternal judgments.—Let us then look to our hearts; that our repentance may be genuine, and that the law of loving God with all our hearts, and our neighbour as ourselves, may be so written in our hearts, as to regulate our conduct in all our transactions.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXV. V. 1—4. It is not said, in what year of Jehoiakim's reign, the event here recorded took place. Probably, it was about the fourth year, when the king of Babylon made war against Jehoiakim. (Notes, 11. xlv. 2. 2 Kings xxiv. 2.)—The Rechabites were a family of the Kenites, who descended from Moses's father-in-law. (Notes, Judg. i. 16. iv. 11. 1 Chr. ii. 55.) They had dwelt in the land from the first, but no inheritance seems to have been allotted them. It was doubtless well known, that they had rules of conduct peculiar to themselves: but this trial was made to shew their steady adherence to their rules, and the reasons which they assigned for it; in order to shame the disobedience of the Jews. (Marg. Ref.) 'The Rechabites' were descended from the Kenites; (1 Chr. ii. 55;) they were never incorporated with the Jews (7); but yet were looked on as friends and allies. (1 Sam. xv. 6.) ... 'They were worshippers of the true God, though they were not circumcised.' Lowth.—The prophet seems to have brought the Rechabites into a chamber adjoining to the temple, and to have been particular in describing it, in order to render the transaction more publick: and Hanan, being "a man of God," or a prophet, (Marg. Ref. e,) would readily accommodate them.—Chamber. (4) Notes,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

In the midst of wrath the Lord remembers mercy: and whatever calamities a sinner endures through life, or however he ends his days; if he dies at peace with God, he is highly favoured: and as faithful reproofs and severe corrections tend far more to this happy event, than flattery and prosperity; they are in themselves far preferable, though seldom chosen.—The mercy of God to us should teach us mercy to our brethren: but they who despise his authority, commonly abuse their authority over others. Yet the Lord will severely punish even the greatest princes for oppressing their meanest slaves. (Notes, Matt. v. 7. Jam. ii. 8—13, v. 13.)—Many things contained in the word of God are not known to his professed worshippers, which they will sometimes obey when clearly set before them: and this is one important end and use of preaching, and of reading publickly and expounding the scriptures.—When those in authority join example to their influence, in promoting equity and humanity, they may effect great things in a little time: and this, as far as it goes, "is doing right in the sight of God," who "loveth righteousness and mercy." But when reformation springs only from terror, and the prospect of imminent destruction, it is seldom durable. Many, in such circumstances, seem very penitent, make hasty resolutions and solemn engagements, and do many things; but when the terror is subsided, they repent of their repentance, fall more entirely under the power of their sins, and seem in haste to undo the little good which they had done. (Note, xxii. 20—23. P. O. 13—30. P. O. Luke xvii. 11—19.) Solemn vows and sacramental engagements, thus entered into, only pollute the name and profane the ordinances of God: and they, who are most forward to bind themselves by imprecations to perform their engagements, are commonly most ready

V. 6, 7. (Note, 2 Kings x. 15, 16. 23—25.) Jonadab lived about three hundred years before this time.—It is probable, that he had practised these rules himself: and having trained up his children to habits of abstemiousness, he enjoined them and their posterity to adhere to them. He seems to have desired, that they should be, as much as possible, kept from temptations to avarice, luxury, and sensual indulgence; and be a hardy, self-denied, and industrious race. He might also foresee the calamities, which were likely to come on Judah and Israel, and desire that his posterity should be prepared for the worst. He seems to have wished them to avoid giving umbrage, or exciting the jealousy or envy of those among whom they lived; which would have been the natural effect of their living in opulence, magnificence, or luxury: since one reason of his rules was, “that they might live long in the land where “they were strangers;” for they were strangers among the Israelites, in the same sense, that the patriarchs were strangers in Canaan. But above all, he doubtless meant, that they should be devoted to God, as a race of perpetual Nazarites: and he deemed these rules conducive to this end, and calculated to render them simple, humble, patient, and superior to the delights of sense.—Such injunctions of dying parents or others, can only be considered as counsels: and, if consistent with scripture, suited to the circumstances of the times, and neither put in the place of the righteousness and atonement of Christ, nor in that of obedience to God's commandments; but subordinated to them, and used in subserviency to true godliness; they may be given and observed with propriety and advantage.—The Rechabites and the Nazarites resembled the religious orders in the Romish church, more than any other persons in the Old Testament: yet they were not forbidden to marry, or commanded “to abstain from meats.” No restriction was laid on them in these respects: whereas, these orders of monks and priests, who are “forbidden to “marry, and commanded to abstain from meats,” are not forbidden to drink wine. (Notes, Num. vi. 3, 4. 1 Tim. iv. 1—5, v. 3.)

V. 8—11. (Marg. Ref.) The Rechabites resided at Jerusalem at this time; not by choice, or through any relaxation of their rules, but to shelter themselves from the invaders.—Nebuchadnezzar conquered Syria, and recruited his army with Syrians.

V. 13—17. The command given to the Rechabites originated from a man like themselves, to whom their obligations were small, when compared with those of the Jews to commandment of their father, which he commanded them; but this people hath not hearkened unto me:

17 Therefore thus saith the LORD God of hosts, the God of Israel; ^a Behold, I will bring upon Judah, and upon all the inhabitants of Jerusalem, all the evil that I have pronounced against them: ^a because I have spoken unto them, but they have not heard; and I have called unto them, but they have not answered.

18 ¶ And Jeremiah said unto the house of the Rechabites, Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel;

^b Because ye have obeyed the commandment of Jonadab your father, and kept all his precepts, and done according unto all that he hath commanded you:

19 Therefore thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel: ^{*} Jonadab the son of Rechab shall not want a man to ^c stand before me for ever.

their God; and whose authority was limited and inconsiderable, compared with that of JEHOVAH. When Jonadab died, all his authority expired with him: he could no longer remind his posterity of his injunctions, take cognizance of their conduct, reward their obedience, or punish their disobedience. Yet, out of respect to his memory, deference to his wisdom, or experience of the salutary effects of his counsels, they persevered in observing them.—But the Jews disobeyed the commands of God, who daily loaded them with benefits; whose authority continued in full force; who earnestly and frequently reminded them of their duty, and called them to repentance; and who could reward or punish them, as much and as long as he pleased.—Moreover, the commands of Jonadab were far more rigorous than the divine laws, and forbade the use and possession of those things, which God allowed his people to possess and to enjoy.—All these considerations tended to expose the folly, ingratitude, and unreasonableness of the people's disobedience; and to illustrate the justice of the punishment about to be inflicted on them. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, vii. 12—15. xxv. 1—3, v. 3. Prov. i. 24—31. Is. i. 1—3. lxxv. 11, 12.)

V. 18, 19. The Rechabites seem to have been preserved comparatively uncorrupted by observing these rules: their respect to their venerable ancestor was commendable, and shewed a docile disposition: it does not appear, that their peculiarities were leavened by superstition, spiritual pride, moroseness, or censoriousness; but rather that they were rendered subservient to piety. Their temperance, frugality, and hardness would favour their preservation amid the desolations of the land; even their poverty would tend to secure them from the conqueror, as it had previously sheltered them from the envy of their neighbours: and it was proper that God should avow his readiness to reward every degree of good, when he determined to punish his apostate people. Accordingly he promised, that the family of the Rechabites should be very durably continued, and upheld in the practice of piety and righteousness before him, as his accepted worshippers, even when the Jews were cast out of his sight. This appears to be the meaning of the expression, “to stand before the LORD:” for it cannot be supposed that they performed any service at the temple. Nothing is known respecting the fulfilment of this promise: but doubtless it was performed, and perhaps may be so to this day; and that, in every age, some of this singular family have been found among the spiritual worshippers of God. (Marg. Ref.—Note, xxxiii. 17, 18.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Every method should be used to bring men to repentance: and when promises and threatenings prove ineffectual, we should attempt to shame them out of their iniquities.—Man is greatly the creature of habit: thus the abstemiousness, which to some would be intolerable, to others is easy, because customary; and they are not affected by temptations, which to others are irresistible.—The longer and the more carefully wise and pious men have observed the course of the world; the more fully have they been convinced that it is vain, vexatious, and ensnaring: and that separation from it, (as far as duty will admit,) is far safer and happier, than the most successful pursuit of its pleasures and possessions. It would not be advisable for us in general to restrict ourselves by such rules, as were prescribed by Jonadab: but it is necessary to learn indifference about all worldly things; to consider ourselves as strangers on earth; and to be devoted to God, and disposed to prefer that station and that way of life, which are best for our souls. We should habituate our appetites to brook denial, even in things lawful; and thus inure ourselves to resist temptation, to be contented with mean fare, and to be prepared for all events.—It is not generally desirable, for young persons to forsake the plain, honest employments of their parents; or to be ambitious of living in a more elegant or fashionable style; that is, amid stronger temptations to pride, luxury, sensuality, and rapacity.—Prudence and moderation are conducive to piety; and tend to preserve families from the contagion of prevailing iniquity and ungodliness: by shunning competition and envy, they conduce to peace and comfort; and by avoiding excess, they promote health and long life: the more mortified we are to this present world, the readier we shall be to leave it, that we may go to a better: and thus we may live and die happy, though we never possess houses or lands, or any of those envied acquisitions, which most men waste their lives in pursuing.—But, whatever rules we prescribe to ourselves, or receive from others; we must count nothing indispensable but the law of God: for there will be circumstances, when regard to safety may render it necessary to dispense with them. Yet no prudence, or good behaviour, can exempt us from sharing the common calamities, to which sin has subjected mankind.—How common is it for men to be more observant of the rules of their order, circle, or sect, or of the traditions of their fathers, than professed Christians are of the precepts of God's word!—

CHAP. XXXVI.

Jeremiah, at God's command, causes Baruch to write in a roll all his threatening prophecies, 1—7. Baruch reads the roll publicly; and afterwards to the princes, who counsel him and Jeremiah to hide themselves, 8—19. Jehudi reads it before Jehoiakim, who cuts it in pieces, and casts it into the fire, contrary to the request of the princes; and orders Jeremiah and Baruch to be apprehended: "but the LORD hid them," 20—26. Jeremiah is directed again to write the same things, with "many like words," and a dreadful sentence against the king; which he does by the hand of Baruch, 27—32.

AND it came to pass ^a in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, the son of Josiah, king of Judah, that this word came unto Jeremiah from the LORD, saying,
 2 Take thee ^b a roll of a book, and ^c write therein all the words that I have spoken unto thee ^d against Israel, and against Judah, and ^e against all the nations from the day I spake unto thee, ^f from the days of Josiah, even unto this day.

3 It ^g may be that the house of Judah will ^h hear all the evil which I purpose to do unto them; that ⁱ they may return every man from his evil way; ^k that I may forgive their iniquity and their sin.

4 Then Jeremiah called ^l Baruch the son of Neriah: and Baruch ^m wrote from the mouth of Jeremiah all the words of the LORD, which he had spoken unto him, "upon a roll of a book."

5 And Jeremiah commanded Baruch, saying, ⁿ "I am shut up; I cannot go into the house of the LORD:

6 Therefore go thou, and read in the roll, which thou hast written from my mouth, ^p the words of the LORD in the ears of the people, in the LORD's house ^q upon the fasting day: and also thou shalt read them in the ears of all Judah that come out of their cities.

7 It ^r may be ^s they will present their supplication before the LORD, ^t and will return every one from his evil way: ^u for great is the anger and fury that the LORD hath pronounced against this people.

8 And Baruch the son of Neriah ^v did according to all that Jeremiah the prophet commanded him, reading in the book the words of the LORD in the LORD's house.

9 And it came to pass ^w in the fifth year of Jehoiakim, the son of Josiah, king of Judah, in the ninth month,

Respect to the memory, authority, or counsel of pious parents will always meet with some recompence from God, and is commonly made effectual for the continuance of true religion in families through successive generations. But those who can neither be awed by the terror, nor allured by the goodness of God, to repent of sin and return to him; who despise his authority which is absolute, their obligations to him which are infinite, his justice and wrath which are almighty to punish, and his mercy and readiness to forgive which are boundless and everlasting, will perish miserably: and all the world will see the justice of God in the condemnation of those who disobey his commandments, and neglect his great salvation.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXVI. V. 1—3. This was twenty-three years from the thirteenth of Josiah, when the prophet was first appointed to his office. (Notes, i. 1—3. xxv. 1—7. xxx. 1—3.)—The Lord foresaw, that the people would not hear and obey: but it was proper that the prophet should do every thing, which could tend to awaken their attention. His endeavours might be useful to individuals, and the rebels would thus appear the more inexcusable.—"These and such like expressions do likewise import, that God's foreknowledge of future events does not put any force upon men's will, or take away the liberty of human

'actions.' Lowth. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xviii. 7—10. xxii. 2—5. Deut. v. 28, 29.)—Roll, &c. (2) Marg. Ref. b.—Notes, Ez. ii. 9, 10. Rev. v. 1—4

V. 4. Jeremiah does not seem to have possessed the skill "of a ready writer;" and therefore Baruch, who might be a more learned man, was employed as his secretary. (Rom. xvi. 22. Gal. vi. 11.) We frequently read of him, as the assistant and companion of Jeremiah; (Marg. Ref. 1.—xxxii. 12. 16. Notes, xlv:) but the apochryphal book which bears his name, seems to be altogether a forgery.

V. 5. 'He was under confinement, probably for having given offence to the king, or the great men, by his prophecies: a calamity which often befell him.' Lowth. (Notes, xx. 1—6.) See xxxiii. 1. xxxix. 15. Heb. where the same word is used as in this place.

V. 6, 7. Some think, that this was the great day of expiation, called by way of eminence, the fast, (Notes, Lev. xvi. Acts xxvii. 9.) though not elsewhere so named; (Note, Lev. xvi. 29—31;) but others suppose it to have been a fast, which was observed on account of the calamitous state of the nation.—'He sheweth, that fasting, without prayer and repentance, availeth nothing, but is mere hypocrisy.' (Notes, 1—3. Is. lviii. 1—7.)

V. 8—10. As the command was given in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, and the fifth year is here mentioned;

^y Lev. xxiii. 27. that ^z they proclaimed a fast before the LORD to all the people in Jerusalem, and to all the people that ^a came from the cities of Judah unto Jerusalem.

^z 5. 10 Then read Baruch in the book the words of Jeremiah in the house of the LORD, ^a in the chamber of ^b Gemariah, the son of ^c Shaphan ^d the scribe, in the higher court, at the ^e entry of the new gate of the LORD's house, in the ears of all the people.

^e 10. 2 Kings xxii. 12—14. xxv. 22. 2 Chr. xxxiv. 20. 11 When Michaiah the son of Gemariah, the son of ^e Shaphan, had heard out of the book all the words of the LORD;

^f 20, 21. xli. 1. 12 Then he went down into the king's house, into the scribes' chamber; and, lo, all the princes sat there, even ^g Elishamah the scribe, and Delaiah the son of Shemaiah, and ^h Elnathan the son of Achbor, and ⁱ Gemariah the son of Shaphan, and Zedekiah the son of ^j Hananiah, and all the princes.

^k 2 Kings xxii. 10. 19. 2 Chr. xxxiv. 16—18. 24. Jon. vi. 6. 13 Then Michaiah ^k declared unto them all the words that he had heard, when Baruch read the book in the ears of the people.

14 Therefore all the princes sent Jehudi the son of ^l Nethaniah, the son of Shelemiah, the son of ^m Cushi, unto Baruch, saying, Take in thine hand the roll wherein thou hast read in the ears of the people, and come. So Baruch the son of Neriah ⁿ took the roll in his hand, and came unto them.

15 And they said unto him, Sit down now ^o and read it in our ears. So Baruch read it in their ears.

16 Now it came to pass, when they had heard all the words, ^p they were afraid, both one and other, and said unto Baruch, ^q We will surely tell the king of all these words.

17 And they asked Baruch, saying, ^r Tell us now, How didst thou write all these words at his mouth?

18 Then Baruch answered them, ^s He pronounced all these words unto me with his mouth, and I wrote them with ink in the book.

19 Then said the princes unto Baruch, ^t Go, hide thee, thou and Jeremiah; and let no man know where ye be.

many expositors are of opinion that the roll was twice read; once in the fourth year when it was little noticed, and afterwards in the fifth year. And as Jeremiah was shut up, when he first ordered Baruch to read the roll; but had liberty to make his escape after it had been read, (5. 19;) they conclude that two distinct readings must be intended. Others think, that the writing of the roll might take up a considerable time; and that it was deemed expedient to wait for the fasting day, as the most convenient time for reading it, which was in the fifth year of Jehoiakim; and that Jeremiah was not shut up in prison, but confined from going to the temple, by some other hindrance: (Note, 5 :) and, though he was at liberty when the notice was taken of Baruch's reading the roll, yet he had not gone up to the temple to read it himself. It is indeed a matter of little importance: yet the arguments of those who think it was twice read, are to me most satisfactory.—In this case, it is supposed, that the first time, was on the great day of atonement; and that soon after Nebuchadnezzar took Jerusalem, and made Jehoiakim captive. (Note, 2 Kings xxiv. 1, 2. Dan. i. 1, 2.) But, having made submissions to the victor, he was restored to the throne; and just after this, the roll was read the second time on a fast, proclaimed and observed in commemoration of that first taking of Jerusalem; and which has ever since been annually observed by the Jews on the eighteenth day of the ninth month.—Chamber, &c. (10) Note, xxxv. 1—4.

V. 11—13. Though the fast was proclaimed by authority (9); yet it does not appear, that either the king or his princes attended the observance of it at the temple. Nor can it be determined, whether Michaiah meant to call the attention of the princes to the word of God, or to inform them against Baruch. Baruch had the use of Gemariah's chamber, who was father to Michaiah; and probably it was by his consent (10); and Ahikam, another of Shaphan's sons, protected Jeremiah on a similar occasion. (Note, xxvi. 24.) Yet it does not appear, that either Gemariah or Ahikam was present when the roll was read.

V. 14—16. (Marg. Ref.) 'The judgments denounced were so terrible as to make the ears of them that heard them to tingle. (xix. 3.)' Lowth.—'The godly were afraid, seeing God was so offended; and the wicked were astonished as the horror of the punishment.'

V. 17, 18. Perhaps the princes supposed, that Baruch had written his roll from memory; and that it was rather to be considered as his composition, than as the substance of Jeremiah's prophecies: and they might ask this apparently frivolous question, in order to silence the alarms excited by considering it as the word of God, and in full force against them. (Note, xliii. 3.) But Baruch, with great simplicity, so answered their question, as to shew that he only acted as amanuensis to Jeremiah, and wrote verbatim what he had dictated to him. (John ix. 10, 11. 15, 26, 27. Note, Prov. xxvi. 4, 5.)

V. 19. The princes had some conviction, that this was a message from God, and were not disposed to persecute Baruch or Jeremiah: yet they would not duly regard the divine authority, or venture the king's displeasure. He must be informed; and they were aware that he would attempt to apprehend Jeremiah and Baruch, and therefore

20 ¶ And they went in to the king into the court, (but ^u they laid up the roll in the chamber of Elishama the scribe,) and told all the words in the ears of the king.

21 So the king sent ^x Jehudi to fetch the roll: and he took it out of Elishama the scribe's chamber. ^y And Jehudi read it in the ears of the king, and in the ears of all the princes which stood beside the king.

22 Now the king sat ^z in the winter-house in the ninth month: and there was a fire on the hearth burning before him.

23 And it came to pass, that when Jehudi had read three or four leaves, ^a he cut it with the penknife, and cast it into the fire that was on the hearth, until all the roll was consumed in the fire that was on the hearth.

24 Yet ^b they were not afraid, ^c nor rent their garments, neither the king, nor any of his servants that heard all these words.

25 Nevertheless ^d Elnathan, and Delaiah, and Gemariah had ^e made intercession to the king that he would not burn the roll; but he would not hear them.

26 But the king commanded Jerah-meel the son of ^{*} Hammelech, and Seraiah the son of Azriel, and Shelemiah the son of Abdeel, ^f to take Baruch the scribe and Jeremiah the prophet; ^g but the LORD hid them.

27 ¶ Then the word of the LORD came to Jeremiah, after ^h that the king had burned the roll, and the words which Baruch wrote at the mouth of Jeremiah, saying,

28 Take thee again ⁱ another roll, and write in it all the former words that were in the first roll, which Jehoiakim the king of Judah hath burned.

29 And thou shalt say to Jehoiakim king of Judah, Thus saith the LORD;

^k Thou hast burned this roll, saying,

^m The king of Babylon shall certainly come and destroy this land, and shall cause to cease from thence man and beast?

30 Therefore thus saith the LORD of Jehoiakim king of Judah; ⁿ He shall have none to sit upon the throne of David: ^o and his dead body shall be cast out in the day to the heat, and in the night to the frost.

31 And I will ^p punish him and his seed, and his servants for their iniquity: and ^q I will bring upon them,

(9 xxv. 1. xxvi. 1.)—Perhaps the prophet lay concealed, during that whole time, from the blood-thirsty rage of the king at least he was directed to let him alone, as one given up to a reprobate mind, for his daring impiety and wickedness on this occasion: while the sentence denounced against him, not being immediately executed, and the prophet apparently silenced, he would be the more hardened in treating the whole as a delusion or imposture.

V. 20—25. It was scarcely possible for a man to shew more contempt and defiance of God, than Jehoiakim did on this occasion. The predictions which he had heard, had been delivered during a long course of years, by a prophet of established reputation: many of his prophecies had already been fulfilled; as Jehoiakim's late captivity, and his state of subjection to Nebuchadnezzar, proved: and they were all coincident with the written word of God, and were addressed immediately to him and his princes. Yet he treated them with the utmost disregard; and deliberately burned the roll, as if the destruction of the sentence could have prevented its execution! (Notes, Deut. xxviii. 68. xxix. 18—25.) And, though his princes were not so absolutely hardened in impiety, but intreated him not to burn the roll; yet it was a great proof of their insensibility, that they rent not their clothes, and shewed no tokens of grief or consternation, either when the roll was read, or when it was so impiously destroyed.—Compare Jehoiakim's conduct with that of his father Josiah, in circumstances not totally dissimilar; which indeed seems to be referred to, by way of contrast. CHAP. XXXVII.

The Chaldeans having left the siege of Jerusalem to meet the Egyptians, Zedekiah sends to desire Jeremiah's prayers; who predicts the certain return and victory of the Chaldeans, 1—10. He is taken up as a deserter, beaten, and put in prison, 11—15. Being privately consulted by Zedekiah, he confirms his former prediction, expostulates with the king, and prevails for some indulgence, 16—21.

niah sat a very short time on his father's throne; and, being carried captive to Babylon, he was succeeded by his uncle Zedekiah. No other of Jehoiakim's race was king over Judah, though some of them had authority under the kings of Persia. Mary the mother of our Lord was not descended from Solomon, but from Nathan, the son of David. Jeconiah indeed is mentioned in our Lord's genealogy by St. Matthew; but that is the line of Joseph, not of Mary. (Notes, xxii. 28—30. Matt. i. 2—17. Luke iii. 23—38.)

V. 32. 'Though the wicked think to have abolished the word of God, when they have burnt the book thereof: yet this declareth that God will not only raise it up again, but also increase it in greater abundance to their condemnation.'—During the persecutions, which the Papists carried on against the reformers, and others whom they called hereticks; the burning of Bibles was a very common and most impious practice, to which this observation refers. (Note, Ez. ii. 9, 10.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—19.

Faithful ministers must use every method of awakening the consciences of sinners, "if peradventure God will give them repentance, to the acknowledging of the truth." (Note, 2 Tim. ii. 23—26, v. 25.) His revealed word, and not his secret purpose, is the rule of their conduct; and they must "declare his whole counsel," whether men will hear or forbear, and without desisting because of ill success. (Notes, Ez. ii. 3—5. Acts xx. 18—27.)—The Lord declares the evil, which he purposes to do against sinners; that they may "hear, and fear, and return from their evil ways." They who thus improve his warnings, in dependence on his promised mercy, will find him ready to forgive all their iniquities: and others will be left without excuse.—Different advantages result from the proposal of truth, by word of mouth, and by writing: the former is generally more copious, particular, energetick, and affecting; the latter more exact, compendious, and permanent. Both should then be used, "according to the ability that God giveth to every man."—Many attend on the outward forms of Religion, and profess humiliation, mortification, and devotion, who are not humbled for their sins, and who do not mortify their lusts, "present their supplication before the LORD," or return from their evil ways. (Notes, Is. i. 10—20. lviii. 1—7. Zech. vii. 4—7.) Yet, when multitudes are collected together on such occasions, the ministers of God may find a favourable opportunity of calling them to repentance, and warning them to flee from impending judgments. But national fasts without national reformation, will avail little to turn away the wrath of God, especially when they, who appoint such solemnities, do not so much as sanction them by their own example!—A faithful declaration of divine truth will attract some attention: but in general it reaches last the ears of those, who are most advanced in rank and authority; and too often finds them most closed against it. Even such as have some conviction of the truth and importance of what they hear, and are disposed to favour those employed in preaching it, are so surrounded with persons of another character, and have so many reserves about their own safety, ease, reputation, interest, or preferment; that they often dare not act according to their convictions, but endeavour to silence them as soon as they can, by one evasion or another: and they often flatter themselves into a persuasion, that they act nobly in their circumstances, if they do not take an active part in persecution, but covertly shelter the servants of God from the rage of their enemies. But those who would "follow the LORD wholly," and be indeed the disciples of Christ, must be prepared to venture and suffer every thing in his cause.

V. 20—32.

There are degrees of guilt even among the ungodly; and condemnation will be proportioned to them. Some rapidly arrive at the height of impiety and presumption; and none more so, than they who have broken off from a religious education. Many act, as if their outrages against the word of God could save them from the condemnation denounced by it; or as if their irrational infidelity could invalidate all the demonstrations which are given of its divine original, and render the sacred oracles of none effect! But such persons should be openly opposed, whatever their rank in life or abilities may be; and a few gentle persuasions do not form a sufficient testimony against their impiety: but their contempt of God's word should be noticed with unequivocal tokens of disapprobation, concern, yea, abhorrence.—The Lord himself will protect those who are valiant for his truth, from all their enemies, until they "have finished their testimony;" and then it is of small consequence, by what means they are removed to heaven. But all their opposers will treasure up wrath, and add to the weight of that condemnation, of which they would not endure to be told: for God will "honour those who honour him," and in proportion as men despise him, they must sink into contempt and misery.

17 Then Zedekiah the king sent and took him out: and the king * asked him secretly in his house, and said, ^a Is there any word from the LORD? And Jeremiah said, There is; for, said he, ^e thou shalt be delivered into the hand of the king of Babylon.

20 Therefore hear now, I pray thee, O my lord, the king: let my supplication, I pray thee, ^a be accepted before thee: that thou cause me not to return to the house of Jonathan the scribe, ⁱ lest I die there.

21 Then Zedekiah the king commanded that they should commit Jeremiah ^k into the court of the prison, ^j and that they should give him daily a piece of bread out of the bakers' street, ^m until all the bread in the city were spent. ⁿ Thus Jeremiah remained in the court of the prison.

In this deplorable situation the prophet was left for a considerable time, namely, till the Chaldeans returned and renewed the siege.

V. 17—21. The princes of Jehoiakim had been more favourable to the prophet than their king, and more afraid of his displeasure. (Note, xxxvi. 19.) But Zedekiah was less inveterate than his princes, and afraid of them in favouring him.—When Jeremiah was interrogated about “the word from the LORD,” he neither concealed nor softened his message, but plainly told the king, that he would be delivered into the hand of the king of Babylon: yet he meant to plead for favour, and to present his supplication to him; to which this might have been deemed a very impolitick preface. But he had truth, reason, justice, and the king’s conscience, on his side; and he needed no subterfuges or artifices. He could appeal to Zedekiah, that he had not offended him or his princes, except by faithfully declaring the word of God: and the flattering prophets, who had promised them peace, were convicted by the event of being deceivers. Surely then he ought not to be sent back to his noisome dungeon, where he must shortly die by famine or disease!—Zedekiah was induced, in some measure, to grant his request, yet he still kept him confined: and though he gave orders that he should be supplied with food, so as to secure him from dying for want; his sustenance was mean and scanty, and he was soon after treated with the greatest cruelty. (Notes, xxxviii. 1—6.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Numbers witness the fatal effects of other men’s sins, and yet heedlessly step into their places, and proceed in the same destructive course: and many, who pay no regard to the instructions and warnings of faithful ministers, will, in great extremities, desire their prayers.—Every respite given to hardened sinners encourages their presumption: they trust to fallacious appearances, and despise the word of God; and they deceive themselves by vain words, till “wrath comes upon them to the uttermost.” But, whatever present appearances may be, the scriptures must be fulfilled; and the feeblest, most unlikely, or despised persons, will suffice to execute the vengeance of God, and to disappoint the confidence of those who rebel against him.—It is unspeakably wearisome to zealous ministers, to witness those crimes and miseries, which they cannot prevent: and cruel treatment, united with ill success, is apt to render them reluctant to their work, and disposed to court privacy and obscurity. But every step which they take will be misrepresented by perverse opposers: the most disinterested friends of their country are frequently treated as traitors or rebels, and the most upright and blameless accused of the worst of crimes; and such calumnies will meet with more credit, than all their asseverations and pleas in their own behalf. Thus, whilst the enemies of God have lodged in palaces and indulged in luxury; his faithful servants have been suffering with wounds, loaded with ignominy and fetters, immured in loathsome dungeons, or dying by famine or torture. But ere long it will be said of the afflicted believer, and to the prosperous sinner, “Now he is comforted, and thou art tormented.” (Note, Luke xvi. 24—26.)—Many secretly favour the servants of God, who, through fear of man and love of sin, will not follow their counsel.—No respect of persons or carnal policy must warp the plain and direct testimony of the faithful minister, even when addressing himself to the proudest and most powerful of the sons of men, whose frown he has most cause to fear, and from whose favour he might hope for many temporal advantages. Yet, as far as consists with his faithfulness, he may properly reason with those who injuriously treat him; enquire what offence he has committed by plainly speaking the word of God; and shew that they who flatter them, are proved to be deceivers by evident facts, and stand condemned even in the consciences of those, who suffer themselves to be deluded by them: and even they, who are most ready to die for the truth, may and ought to use lawful means of self-preservation, and of obtaining fairer treatment. All this, however, should be done with great meekness, without reproaches or acrimonious complaints: and the bolder any man is in the cause of God, the more gentle, patient, and pliant should he be about his own concerns: his message must be delivered with authority over the consciences even of the greatest princes; but he should be ready to speak with deference and submission, and as a suppliant, when pleading his own cause.—The Lord has all hearts in his hands, and can incline his enemies to favour his servants, as much as he sees good: yet those who would be faithful to him, must prepare for enduring hardship and tribulation in this evil world.

NOTES

CHAP. XXXVIII. V. 1—6. Some of these persons were sent by Zedekiah to Jeremiah, to enquire concerning the event of the siege, and to desire his prayers. (xxi. 1, 2. xxxvii. 3.)—‘The answer which he returned by them to the king, he afterward published to all the people; which was the occasion of the new troubles, ... recorded in this chapter.’ Lowth. (Notes, xxi. 4—10. xxvii. 12—15. xxxvii. 6—10.)—Though confined in the court of the prison, Jeremiah continued to prophesy; and those who had access to him, made known to all the people his predictions. This greatly offended the princes, who determined to defend themselves to the last extremity; and they resolved to put him to death. They therefore represented him to the king, as an enemy to the nation, who intentionally sought their hurt; though his labours, sufferings, tears, and supplications abundantly proved his fervent love to them: and Zedekiah (who seems to have been a prince of slender capacity, and who was greatly under the power of his nobles, by reason of his difficult circumstances,) would not venture any thing to protect him, but abjectly left him in the hands of his enemies; though with some indication of resentment, at their opposition to his more clement intentions. (Note, xxxvii. 17—21.) Having thus extorted the king's consent, the malicious princes without delay caused the prophet to be let down into a dungeon, or pit, where he sunk in the mire, and must soon miserably have perished: it appears to have been the bottom of the dungeon and cells before described. (Note, xxxvii. 16.) Probably, they intended to have then given out that he died in prison; and perhaps this dungeon was prepared for such silent executions. ‘Some think that when he was in this dismal place, he made those mournful meditations, which are set down in the third chapter of the Lamentations. Lowth. (Notes, Lam. iii. 52—57.)—Hammelech signifies the king: (Marg.) the dungeon seems to have belonged to one of Zedekiah's sons. (xxxii. 2. xxxvi. 26. xxxix. 6.)

V. 7—13. We have here an example of fortitude and active kindness as noble, as the conduct of the prince was base and disingenuous. Ebed-melech, a Cushite, stranger, perhaps a negro, whose name seems to imply that was in the king's house, heard that they had put Jeremiah in the dungeon; (^r the king then sitting in the gate of Benjamin;)

8 Ebed-melech went forth out of the king's house, and spake to the king, saying,

9 My lord the king, ^s these men have done evil in all that they have done to Jeremiah the prophet, whom they have cast into the dungeon; and he ^t is like to die for hunger in the place where he is; ^u for there is no more bread in the city.

10 Then ^v the king commanded Ebed-melech the Ethiopian, saying, Take from hence thirty men ^w with thee, and take up Jeremiah the prophet out of the dungeon before he die.

11 So Ebed-melech took the men with him, and went into the house of the king under the treasury, and took thence old cast clouts, and old rotten rags, and ^x let them down by cords into the dungeon to Jeremiah,

12 And Ebed-melech the Ethiopian said unto Jeremiah, ^y Put now these old cast clouts and rotten rags under thine arm-holes, under the cords. And Jeremiah did so.

13 So they drew up Jeremiah with cords, and took him up out of the dungeon: ^z and Jeremiah remained in the court of the prison.

14 ¶ Then Zedekiah the king ^a sent, and took Jeremiah the prophet unto him into the ^b third entry that is in the house of the LORD: and the king said unto Jeremiah, ^c I will ask thee a thing; hide nothing from me.

15 Then Jeremiah said unto Zedekiah, If I declare it unto thee, ^d wilt thou not surely put me to death? and if I give thee counsel, wilt thou not hearken unto me?

16 So Zedekiah the king ^e sware secretly unto Jeremiah, saying, As the LORD liveth, ^f that made us this soul, I will not put thee to death, neither will I give thee into the hand ^g of these men that seek thy life.

17 Then said Jeremiah unto Zedekiah, Thus saith the LORD, the God of hosts, the God of Israel; ^h If thou wilt assuredly go forth unto the king of Babylon's princes, then thy soul shall live, and this city shall not be burned with fire; and thou shalt live, and thine house.

he had been the king's slave, though now preferred, was employed to deliver the prophet, and to shame the Jews. Hearing that Jeremiah had been cast into the dungeon; he, without hesitation or delay, and without fearing the wrath of the nobles, boldly went to Zedekiah, when engaged in publick business; and plainly told him, that they had done wickedly in acting in so cruel a manner towards the prophet of God; and that he must soon perish with hunger in the dungeon. By this representation he obtained from the king a commission to rescue Jeremiah, and a guard to protect him in this service, which he performed with great promptitude and tenderness; and thus saved a most valuable life, though not without the hazard of his own. (Note, xxxix. 15—18.)

To die for hunger. (9) 'They needed not to have put him into the dungeon; he would have died of hunger, without adding the cruelty of that punishment; "for there is, &c." Lowth.—This, however, does not seem to be the obvious meaning of the words: and perhaps Ebed-melech was not aware, what a dreadful place the dungeon was, in which the prophet must soon have been suffocated in the mire, or killed by the exhalations of so noisome a pit; but was fully assured that, being confined and out of sight, he would perish by hunger; for none would carry him any food, when the famine in the city became extreme. (xxxvii. 21.)

V. 14—16. Jeremiah could not but consider Zedekiah as concerned in the cruelty, with which he had been treated; yet he made no complaints. He was not, however, forward to repeat those warnings and counsels, which seemed only to endanger his own life, and to increase the guilt of the king. 'The prophet had such experience of the unsteadiness of the king's temper, of his backwardness in following good counsel, and want of courage to stand by those that durst advise him well; that he might with good reason resolve not to venture his life, to serve a man, that was in a manner incapable of being directed.' Lowth. It does not appear, that he was charged with any message at this time to Zedekiah; though informed of the will of God respecting him.—The questions proposed by the prophet implied, that he required Zedekiah to promise not to put him to death; and that he would follow his counsel, as the condition of his declaring the word of God. Some read the last without an interrogation; "Thou wilt not hearken to me." The king, however, made no promise of complying with his counsel; but he engaged with a solemn oath, by the living JEHOVAH, the Giver of their lives and souls, that he would neither put him to death, nor leave him in the hands of his enemies. 23 So ^s they shall bring out all thy wives and thy children to the Chaldeans; and thou shalt not escape out

Mock me. (19) Zedekiah was conscious, that he had acted basely, in violating his oath to the king of Babylon; and that he was considered by many of the Jews, as having brought ruin and infamy on his country, by his impolitick and dishonourable conduct.

V. 20—23. The prophet could not alter his message; and if Zedekiah feared the contempt of man more than the wrath of God, he must take the consequence. (Notes, Is. li. 7, 8. Matt. x. 27, 28.) He, however, assured him, that the mockery which he feared, should not come on him, if he obeyed God: but, on the contrary, that he should meet with kind usage and preserve his life. But if he refused to comply with this humiliating counsel, he must be previously informed, that the women of his household, being delivered up to the princes of Babylon, would certainly upbraid him in his calamities, for trusting to his friends; who, having seduced him from his allegiance to Nebuchadnezzar, and engaged him in the unequal contest, had prevailed against him to his ruin; and, having entangled him in inextricable difficulties, as if his feet sunk in the mire, had left him to his doom, and turned back from him to secure themselves. Thus his wives and children would fall into the hands of the enraged conquerors: and all the cruelty inflicted on them, as well as his own miseries, and the burning of the city and temple, would be the effect of his obstinacy, and be considered as his crime; seeing that he might have prevented them by submitting to the

V. 24—28. Zedekiah would not follow the prophet's advice; nay, he even seems to have hesitated as to his oath of protecting him, and to have substituted for it a conditional promise. He was slavishly afraid of the princes. He supposed that they would certainly hear of this interview; and he required Jeremiah to inform them, that he had petitioned the king not to send him again to the dungeon in Jonathan's house. (Notes, xxxvii. 16—21.) As this, doubtless, was truth, and as the princes had no right to be informed of all that had passed, Jeremiah complied; and was thus preserved in the court of the prison till the city was taken. (Note, xxxix. 11—14.) This seems to have been his last interview with Zedekiah.—What a view do these verses give of the extreme wickedness and impiety, prevalent in Judah, especially in the superior orders! Whatever was enquired of this most eminent and excellent servant of God, and friend to his people, or proposed to him, by either the king or his nobles; the highest recompence was a promise that he should not be put to death! A promise, which could not in the smallest degree be depended on,

hence the zealous servant of God: whatever he suffers or fears, he cannot but fulfil his ministry, as he has opportunity; and he cannot consent to any alteration or compromise respecting it.—Submission to Providence, and to those who obtain the pre-eminence, is very contrary to the proud heart of man. But though liberty is very valuable, and worthy to be preserved at a great price; yet we must not rebel against God, or throw away our lives, if he please to permit us to be deprived of it.—Those who point out to men the only way of safety and happiness, and who spend themselves in the most disinterested matter, to promote their present and future welfare, must in many cases expect to be deemed enemies, and worthy of death, for declaring the whole truth! Doubtless their counsels and warnings tend to weaken the hands of those who fight against God; their words run counter to the projects and lusts, and are uneasy to the consciences, of ungodly men; and therefore they conclude that they seek the hurt, and not the welfare, of the people. Thus the wicked, when armed with power, are pushed forward to persecution; while such as secretly favour those who are persecuted, often do not think it worth while to risk any thing for their protection. (Notes, Matt. xxvii. 24, 25. John xix. 8—12.)—Man's cruel ingenuity has invented various methods of torture and destruction; and persecutors have always been most remarkable for refinement in cruelty. Besides the numbers, who have been openly tortured and put to death; it will never be known, how many servants of God have been privately murdered, before that time, when "the earth shall disclose her blood, and no more cover her slain." (Notes, Is. xxvi. 20, 21.)—But till the "witnesses have finished their testimony," the malice of their enemies must be frustrated: (Notes, Rev. xi. 7—12:) for God will raise up instruments for their protection, where they might have been least expected. Equity, humanity, piety, and zealous boldness in a good cause, have been found in persons of every climate, complexion, or rank in life: and the Lord often chooses those, who by birth, education, and outward circumstances, labour under peculiar disadvantages; in order to shame the conduct of degenerate professors of true religion.—Even the retirements or engagements of princes should be interrupted, to prevent the shedding of innocent blood. In such a cause we should not fear either the displeasure of man, or any personal consequence; for where so great evil is about to be done, decided plain language is becoming, though the greatest princes be the perpetrators of the mischief. (Note, Prov. xxiv. 11, 12.)—They, who use their influence in the fear of God, to prevent injustice, oppression, or murder, may expect that he will protect and prosper them: and those timid tempers which are easily seduced into sinful compliances,

IN the ninth year of Zedekiah king of Judah, in the tenth month, came Nebuchadrezzar, king of Babylon, and all his army against Jerusalem, and they besieged it.

may often be as easily engaged by firm expostulation, to retract, and to prevent the consequences. Promptitude and tenderness should always concur in our efforts to relieve the distressed; and the manner of shewing kindness is sometimes as expressive and as agreeable, as the favour itself.

V. 14—28.

The man of God must never yield to resentment, or suffer himself to be "overcome of evil:" he must ever be ready to give good counsel, and to promote the salvation of those who have most deeply injured him: he ought to do any thing to win upon them, except flattering them, or offending his Lord.—It is not always necessary to exasperate proud men, by repeated warnings, which they have often heard in vain. It may be proper to appeal to their consciences, whether they be not determined against doing the will of God, though they pretend to enquire after it? And it may sometimes be prudent to require of them promises, that they will not resent or punish us for what is spoken. Yet if any relenting appear, and there be even a distant hope of succeeding, we should not be too anxious about our own safety; but "declare the whole counsel of God," and leave the event with him.—Whilst men have only some general convictions, and not a steady realizing faith, they will be "unstable in all their ways." (Note, Jam. i. 5—8.) The fear of reproach will preponderate against the fear of almighty God: and every trifle will induce them to refuse that obedience, which alone can ensure their welfare and the life of their souls. Thus men treat faithful monitors as enemies, and flattering sycophants as bosom-friends, and bring on themselves, by disobedience, the very evils which they dreaded from obedience; till "their feet sink in the mire," their selfish friends forsake them, and they involve their families and connexions of every kind with them in inevitable destruction. But when ministers faithfully counsel and warn powerful ungodly men, they may consider themselves as highly favoured, if they are not put to death, or delivered up to the will of their enemies.—The less men fear God, the more they fear their fellow creatures; and often they dare not act according to their own judgments, consciences, or inclinations, lest they should be censured by their own servants!—We are not, however, bound to speak all we know to gratify our enemies, when no good end can be answered: and a partial evasive answer, if not contrary to truth, is sufficient for an impertinent and malicious enquiry. We have then need to be "wise as serpents, and harmless as doves."

4 And it came to pass that ^fwhen Zedekiah the king of Judah saw them, and all the men of war, then they fled, and went forth out of the city by night, by the way of the king's garden, by the gate ^gbetwixt the two walls; and he went out by the way of the plain.

5 But the ^hChaldeans' army pursued after them, and overtook Zedekiah ⁱin the plains of Jericho: and when they had taken him, they brought him up to Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, to Riblah in the land of ^kHamath, where he ^lgave judgment upon him.

6 Then the king of Babylon ^mslew the sons of Zedekiah, in Riblah ⁿbefore his eyes: also the king of Babylon ^oslew all the nobles of Judah.

people, which had nothing, in the land of Judah, and gave them vineyards and fields ^xat the same time.

V. 11—14. Nebuchadnezzar must have heard frequently of Jeremiah's predictions, many of which were now fulfilled; and this would dispose him to respect his character. He had likewise no doubt been informed that the prophet had suffered many things, for advising the Jews to surrender. The prophet was therefore set at liberty to go home to Anathoth or elsewhere, as he pleased, and accordingly he at length joined the remnant under Gedaliah. (Notes, xl. 1. 6.)

V. 15—18. This message was sent to Ebed-melech before the taking of the city. He seems to have been greatly afraid of the princes, whom he had offended by his kindness to Jeremiah: but the Lord assured him, that they would in a very little time be deprived of power; for the city would soon be destroyed. And at the same time, he was assured of protection in that catastrophe: he should escape with his life, whilst others fell by the sword; seeing he had trusted in the Lord, and exposed himself to danger, by rescuing his prophet from his powerful persecutors.—It is worth remarking, that his confidence in God, rather than his kindness to Jeremiah, is assigned as the special reason of the promise here made to him. Had he been kind to the prophet, merely from humanity or inferior motives, it would not have been noticed in this manner: but, exerting himself to deliver a prophet "in the name of a prophet, he received a prophet's reward." PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

"He that being often reprov'd hardeneth his neck, shall suddenly perish, and that without remedy:" and they, who will not credit the words of God, will be dreadfully convinced by the event, that not one of them fails of accomplishment.—They fatally err, who mistake reprieves for pardons; and they labour in vain, who attempt to resist or elude the executioners of divine vengeance.—External sanctity will be equally unavailing, with magnificence, or strong fortifications, to defend sinners against deserved wrath: and their obstinacy often occasions the misery and destruction of their children, relatives, and neighbours, as well as their own.—How precarious are earthly possessions! And how soon they are shifted from one hand to another, especially in times of public calamity! But whether the Lord makes men poor or rich, nothing can durably profit them, whilst they cleave to their sins.—The servants of God alone are prepared for all events: they are delivered and comforted, when the wicked are suffering for their crimes; and they often meet with more respect and kindness from the profane, or from idolaters, than from hypocrites and formalists. God, however, will raise them up friends, and do them good, and perform all his promises to them.—"In every nation, he that feareth God, and worketh righteousness, is accepted of him:" (Notes, Acts x. 34, 35 :) and he will reward men for the kindness which they shew to his people for his sake. He gives encouragement to his servants, according to their perils, fears, and trials; and will never suffer those to be confounded or perish, who trust in his mercy and obey his commandments. And if it be a great favour for those, who live in perilous times, to have their "life given them for a prey;" what cause shall we have for gratitude, if we escape the temptations, and are carried through the trials, of this evil world, and finally obtain the eternal salvation of our souls!

NOTES.

CHAP. XL. V. 1. The five following chapters record the events which occurred in Judah, after Jerusalem was taken, till the residue of the Jews went into Egypt, and after they came thither; and contain several messages of God to them; which were "the word which came to Jeremiah from the LORD." This chapter is wholly historical.—It appears that Jeremiah, after he had been freed from prison, continued among the Jews, till he was bound, or hand-cuffed, (marg.) with others of them, and carried to Ramah; and that he was there again set at liberty, in the manner here related. (Notes, xxxix. 11—14.)—Ramah.] Marg. Ref.—Note, xxxi. 15—17.

V. 2, 3. The Jews were so blinded, that they could not see, or would not acknowledge, the hand of God in these events, or that they were the just punishment of their sins. But this Gentile evidently perceived it: and perhaps he thought that this justified all the violence and cruelty, which he and the Chaldeans had committed. (Notes, Deut. xxix. 21—26. Lam. iv. 13—16.)

V. 4, 5. Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Not yet, &c. (5) "While he" (Jeremiah) "yet would not return, he said, "Go back, &c." The prophet seems to have hesitated at 6 Then went Jeremiah unto Gedaliah the son of Ahikam to ^k Mizpah; and dwelt with him among the people that were left in the land.

7 ¶ Now when ^l all the captains of the forces which were in the fields, even they and their men, heard that the king of Babylon had made Gedaliah the son of Ahikam governor in the land, and had committed unto him men, and women, and children, and of ^m the poor of the land, of them that were not carried away captive to Babylon;

8 Then they ⁿ came to Gedaliah to Mizpah, ^o even Ishmael the son of Nethaniah, ^p and Johanan and ^q Jonathan the sons of Kareah, and Seraiah the son of Tanhumeth, and the sons of Ephai ^r the Netophathite, and Jezaniah the son of ^s a Maachathite, they and their men.

9 And Gedaliah the son of Ahikam the son of Shaphan ^t sware unto them, and to their men, saying, ^u Fear not to serve the Chaldeans: dwell in the land, and serve the king of Babylon, and it shall be well with you.

10 As for me, behold, I will dwell at Mizpah, to ^v serve the Chaldeans which will come unto us: but ye, ^w gather ye wine, and ^x summer-fruits, and oil, and put them in your vessels, and dwell in your cities that ye have taken.

11 Likewise when ^y all the Jews that were in Moab, and among the Ammonites, and in Edom, and that were in all the countries, heard that the king of Babylon had left a remnant of Judah, and that he had set over them Gedaliah the son of Ahikam the son of Shaphan;

12 Even all the Jews returned out of all places whither they were driven, and came to the land of Judah, to Gedaliah, unto Mizpah, and gathered wine and summer-fruits very much.

13 ¶ Moreover ^z Johanan the son of Kareah, and all the captains of the forces that were in the fields, came to Gedaliah to Mizpah,

14 And said unto him, Dost thou certainly know, that Baalis the king of the ^a Ammonites hath sent ^b Ishmael the son of Nethaniah to ^c slay thee? But Gedaliah the son of Ahikam ^d believed them not.

15 Then Johanan the son of Kareah spake to Gedaliah in Mizpah secretly, saying, ^e Let me go, I pray thee, and I will slay Ishmael the son of Nethaniah, and no man shall know it: ^f where-first, what course to take. (Notes, xxvi. 24. 2 Kings xxv. 22—26.)

V. 6. It is doubtful, whether Jeremiah acted prudently in this decision: the event seems to indicate the contrary; and it was the evident meaning of all the foregoing predictions, that the Jews should not prosper in their own land, till seventy years were expired. But he was influenced by love to the promised land, and to the remnant of his people; and he preferred the hopes of doing them good, to any favour which could have been shewn him in Babylon. (Notes, xvii. 15—18. xxv. 8—11.)—Mizpah. Marg. Ref. k.

V. 7—12. (Note, xxvi. 24.) Perhaps Gedaliah had previously surrendered to the Chaldeans: or, by some services, and his general character for integrity and capacity, he had recommended himself to the confidence of the victors. It was not their intention entirely to desolate the land: and therefore they wished to induce the poor remains of the Jews to settle there; as they feared no further resistance, when Jerusalem lay in ruins, and their rulers and nobles were either slain or made captives. They therefore placed Gedaliah over them, to encourage them to settle, and cultivate their lands. (Note, 4, 5.) Accordingly he fixed his residence at Mizpah, a considerable town in the confines of Judah and Benjamin: (Note, 6:) and many of those who had commanded bodies of troops in different parts of the land, and of those who had fled into the adjacent countries, now repaired to Gedaliah, with some hopes of enjoying peace and acquiring a settlement. (Marg. Ref.)—Gedaliah seems to have been an upright man, and a cordial friend to his people, and well approved by them. He encouraged them to expect protection from the Chaldeans, whilst they continued in quiet subjection: he engaged, with a solemn oath, not to injure or oppress them, but to do them all the service in his power: and he excited them to make all the provision which they could for their wants, by collecting such of the fruits of the earth as had escaped the ravages of war. Accordingly their numbers increased; they gathered great abundance of provisions; and they had a fair prospect of again prospering, had not their unrepented wickedness entailed divine judgments on them. (Notes. 2 Kings xxv. 22—26. Ez. xxxiii. 24—29.)

Serve. (10) Or, “stand before” the Chaldeans, as a mediator: (Note, xv. 1. Zech. iii. 1—4:) or, as ready to receive and obey their commands.

V. 13—16. Johanan and his companions seem to have acted honestly in this affair. They had received certain intelligence of the plot formed against Gedaliah’s life, and consequently against the whole new settlement. Ishmael (whose very name seemed hostile to Israel,) being a branch of David’s family, was probably displeased that another fore should he slay thee, that all the Jews which are gathered unto thee should be scattered, and the remnant of Judah perish?

16 But Gedaliah the son of Ahikam said unto Johanan the son of Kareah, 'Thou shalt not do this thing; for thou speakest falsely of Ishmael.

was preferred above him: and the king of the Ammonites, (as it seems, out of hatred to the Jews,) employed him to slay Gedaliah. (Marg. Ref. a, b.) But Gedaliah, conscious of his own integrity and good will to the people, was too unsuspecting: and as Johanan proposed a violent and very exceptionable method of defeating Ishmael's design, he seems to have considered the information as malicious. Yet he certainly ought to have examined into the evidence, and to have confined Ishmael; or to have taken some precautions for his own safety, on which that of the people so much depended. But he was left to this indiscretion, that judgment might come to the uttermost on this incorrigible remnant of the Jews. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, xli. 1—10.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS

Many can see the justice of God's judgments, and the truths of his words, in the case of others, who are heedless, or blind, as to those things which relate to themselves. Nay, some plead the prophecies against the Jews, and the descendants of Ham, in vindication of their own or other men's cruel oppressions of them; and think themselves justified, because the scripture is fulfilled: (Notes, Gen. ix. 24, 25. Deut. xxviii. 37:) though it was equally fulfilled by the treachery of Judas, and the malice of those who crucified Christ! None, however, are so hardened as apostate professors of religion.—It is allowable for faithful ministers to receive the proffered kindness even of ungodly men, when it can be done without appearance of selfishness; when it does not tend to deceive or prejudice the giver; and when it is not to be purchased, or repayed, by any sinful compliances or flatteries. (Notes, 2 Kings v. 15—19. viii. 9.) Nay, their counsel may be often taken in secular matters; for they are "wise in their generation."—Those who earnestly desire the salvation of sinners, and the prosperity of the church, are apt to take encouragement from transient appearances, to expect better times: and they prefer the hope of being useful, to the most secure and profitable situations, in which they would be shut out from the ordinances of God, and waste their lives to no purpose.—After heavy calamities men might again obtain peace and comfort, if they would but submit to Providence, and to those placed over them; if they would accommodate themselves to their circumstances,

NOW it came to pass ^a in the seventh month, that ^b Ishmael the son of Nethaniah the son of ^c Elishama, ^d of the ^e seed royal, and the princes of the king, even ten men with him, came unto Gedaliah the son of Ahikam to Mizpah; and there ^f they did eat bread together in Mizpah.

2 Then arose Ishmael the son of Nethaniah, and the ten men that were with him, and smote Gedaliah the son of Ahikam the son of Shaphan with the sword, and slew him, ^g whom the king of Babylon had made governor over the land.

and apply themselves, with diligence, quietness, and honesty, to the duties of their station; and especially, if they would repent of their sins, and seek peace with God and protection from him. (Note, xxix. 4—7.) But his wrath pursueth the impenitent into every place and condition: and whilst pride, ambition, avarice, or revenge bear rule, men will form new projects, and be restless in mischief, which commonly ends in their own ruin and that of other men.—Advancement, above such as were equals or superiors, always excites envy and opposition: and no equity, kindness, or services, can afford security from the assaults of turbulent enmity and disappointed ambition. (Notes, Prov. xxvii. 4. Ec. iv. 4—6.)—When men mean well, they are often too free from suspicion: and even information and good counsel, when given with violence, and connected with unjustifiable proposals, will often be rejected by conscientious persons. We have, however, need to be "wise as serpents, as well as harmless as doves;" not only for our own preservation, but to prevent "one sinner from destroying much good." Yet we should especially learn to trust in God alone; as the most powerful earthly protectors cannot secure us, from the base designs even of very mean and inconsiderable enemies.

vate affairs; would have been more careful, in defending a life, on which the safety of the whole company so greatly depended.—Ishmael, by coming to Gedaliah, had virtually submitted to his authority, and claimed his protection: and he was at this time, along with his friends, hospitably entertained by Gedaliah.—Yet he slew ^r all that joined with Gedaliah in opposing him: for several of the commanders, ^r as well as the greatest part of the people, were still left ^r alive, as it appears by the sequel. (10, 11.) Lowth. Most of these, however, seem to have been absent from Mizpah, at this time, gathering in the fruits of the earth, or attending to their private concerns: (Note, xl. 7—12:) so that probably all present, who stood out in resistance, were slain, and the rest kept in close confinement, that the transaction might be concealed, till Ishmael had completed his designs.

V. 4—8. The care, which had been taken to conceal the murder of Gedaliah and his adherents, gave Ishmael an opportunity of still further increasing the number and atrocity of his crimes.—The places, here mentioned, had belonged to the kingdom of Israel: (Marg. Ref. k—m:) but they were not far from Mizpah; and it is probable, that these men were Jews, who had resorted to Gedaliah, and, confiding in his protection, had fixed their residence in different places, in order to gather in the fruits of the earth. They expressed their grief for the calamities of the nation, by some observances which were forbidden in the law, on funeral occasions; (Marg. Ref. n, o.—Note, xvi. 5—7;) but were customary, and perhaps counted allowable in seasons of public calamity.—Some think, that Gedaliah, after the destruction of the temple, had erected an altar, and appointed a temporary place of worship at Mizpah, to which they purposed to carry their offerings: but it is more likely, that they meant to shew their regard to the ruins of the temple, and there to offer their oblations, as well as the circumstances would admit.—The hypocrisy of Ishmael, in pretending to sympathize in their sorrows, and inviting them to see Gedaliah; and then murdering a company of men who gave him no provocation, without sparing any but those who appealed to his avarice; when added to his other crimes, constituted a complication of atrocious wickedness, which has scarcely ever been exceeded.—Perhaps he hoped at first to win them over to his party: but perceiving their attachment to Gedaliah, he thus wreaked his vengeance on them.

Treasures in the field. (8) Hidden stores, which could not be found, except by their discovering them. These they would deliver to him, as the ransom of their lives. (Notes, Job ii. 4, 5. Prov. xiii. 8. Matt. xvi. 24—28. Phil. iii. 8—11.)

V. 9. Asa fortified Mizpah: and in doing this, he doubtless made trenches as well as ramparts: but perhaps this pit was a hiding place, which he prepared for security, in case Baasha should suddenly assault him. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, Judg. vi. 2, 3. 1 Sam. xiii. 6, 7. 1 Kings xv. 16—22.)—^r A reservoir; a large pit for receiving rain water, which Asa caused to be made in the midst of the city, in order that he might not be in want of so necessary an article in case of a siege. Blayney.

V. 10. Perhaps Ishmael had at first hoped that the Jews would join him; and that, by the help of the king of Ammon, he should be able to make a stand against the Chaldeans, who had withdrawn most of their forces from that neighbourhood. But he now despaired of success in that way; and proceeded to carry the whole unarmed multitude captive into the land of Ammon. Among them, it seems

11 ¶ But when ^y Johanan the son of Kareah, and all the captains of the forces that were with him, heard of all the evil that Ishmael the son of Nethaniah had done ;

12 Then they took all the men, and went ^z to fight with Ishmael the son of Nethaniah, and found him by ^a the great waters that are in Gibeon.

13 Now it came to pass, that when all the people, which were with Ishmael, saw Johanan the son of Kareah, and all the captains of the forces that were with him, then they were glad 14 So all the people, that Ishmael had carried away captive from Mizpah, cast about and returned, and went unto Johanan the son of Kareah.

15 But Ishmael the son of Nethaniah escaped from Johanan with ^b eight men, and went to the Ammonites.

16 Then took Johanan the son of Kareah, and all the captains of the forces that were with him, all the remnant of the people, whom he had recovered from Ishmael the son of Nethaniah, from Mizpah, (after that he had slain Gedaliah the son of Ahikam,) ^d even mighty men of war, and the women, and the children, and the eunuchs, whom he had brought again from Gibeon:

17 And they departed, and dwelt in the habitation of ^e Chimham, which is by Bethlehem, ^f to go to enter into Egypt,

18 Because of the Chaldeans : ^g for they were afraid of them, ^h because Ishmael the son of Nethaniah had slain Gedaliah the son of Ahikam, ⁱ whom the king of Babylon made governor in the land.

there were some daughters of king Zedekiah, who had been left to the care of Gedaliah, when his sons were slain ; and these, being recovered from Ishmael by Johanan, went down with him into Egypt, and seem to have died there with the other Jews. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xxii. 28—30. xliii. 4—7.)

V. 11—15. Johanan seems to have been employed at a distance from Gedaliah ; so that it was some time before he heard tidings of these tragical events. But when he was informed of them, he immediately pursued Ishmael, who had not courage to face him ; and being deserted, instead of apprehended by those, whom he had detained as prisoners, he escaped the avenging sword of Johanan.—Ishmael came to Gedaliah with ten men, who are supposed to have been princes of Judah, with their retainers : but he fled with only eight men. Perhaps the others had before left him, or had lost their lives in these bloody transactions : and, if they had retainers, these might think it safer to join Johanan, than to accompany Ishmael in his flight. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 16—18. Johanan had hitherto acted properly ; and it was right that he should assume the command, till the king of Babylon had been informed of these transactions. He and the other princes, having taken a decided part against Ishmael, had no sufficient reason to fear, lest the Chaldeans would revenge on them the murder of Gedaliah. (Notes, xlii. 10—17.)—Perhaps Johanan was unwilling to be superseded in the command ; and so used his influence to induce the whole company to take refuge in Egypt ; and their old attachment to the Egyptians rendered them the more ready to concur in this ruinous measure.—“The habitation of Chimham” seems to have been a residence and estate, which David had settled on Chimham the son of Barzillai, out of his own patrimony. (Note, 2 Sam. xix. 31—39.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

When God is provoked to leave men to themselves, and to the temptations of Satan, they are hurried on into every kind of wickedness ; their impetuous passions burst through all restraints, and misery and destruction attend their ways.—While divine judgments are executing on guilty nations, the best men are often first cut off, for the punishment of the survivors. (Notes, 2 Kings xxiii. 26—33. Is. lvii. 1, 2.)—Candour and generosity frequently expose men to the base designs of those wretches, who are of “their father the devil,” and who closely copy his example of subtlety, malice, and murder. (Notes and P. O. John viii. 37—47.) They, who hate the worshippers of God, can assume the appearance of piety and love, that they may better accomplish their purposes : and the thirst for blood, like other depraved appetites, becomes more insatiable by every gratification ; until men delight in murder for its own sake.—It is well for mankind, that one selfish passion very oftens restrains another, in the conduct of the multitudes who are not influenced by a better motive. Thus avarice checks the progress of cruelty ; ambition and pride that of licentiousness ; the love of licentious pleasures, that of avarice, ambition, and revenge ; and the fear of consequences, restrains all the other selfish passions. By these and similar means, the Lord bounds and over-rules the wickedness of ungodly men ; and provides for the accomplishment of his own wise designs, whether of judgment or of mercy.—As death, in such varied forms, meets men in those places where they least expect it, we should continually enquire, whether we be in such a state and frame of mind, as we should desire to be found in, when called to appear before our Judge. And, as men readily give all their substance to ransom their lives, how ready should we be to forsake all for the salvation of our souls !—If our hearts delight in the ordinances of God, and are disposed to sympathize in the afflictions of his people, and to regard the interests of true religion as our interests, death can do us no harm ; but will remove us to that happy place, where “all tears will be wiped from our eyes.”—They, who are most

THEN ^a all the captains of the forces, and Johanan the son of Kareah, and ^b Jezaniah the son of Hoshai, and all the people ^c from the least even unto the greatest, ^d came near,

2 And said unto Jeremiah the prophet, Let, we beseech thee, our supplication ^e be accepted before thee, ^f and pray for us unto the LORD thy God, even for all this remnant; (for we are ^g left but a few of many, as thine eyes do behold us;)

3 That the LORD thy God ^h may shew us the way wherein we may walk, and the thing that we may do.

4 Then Jeremiah the prophet said unto them, I have heard you: behold,

^h I will pray unto the LORD your God

according to your words; and it shall come to pass, that ⁱ whatsoever thing the LORD shall answer you, I will declare it unto you; ^k I will keep nothing back from you.

5 Then they said to Jeremiah, ^l The LORD be a true and faithful witness between us, ^m if we do not even according to all things, for the which the LORD thy God shall send thee to us.

6 Whether ⁿ it be good, or whether it be evil, we will obey the voice of the LORD our God, to whom we send thee; ^o that it may be well with us, when we obey the voice of the LORD our God.

7 ¶ And it came to pass ^p after ten days, that the word of the LORD came unto Jeremiah.

8 Then called he ^q Johanan the son of Kareah, and all the captains of the forces which were with him, and all the people from the least even to the greatest,

9 And said unto them, Thus saith the LORD, the God of Israel, ^r unto whom ye sent me to present your supplication before him;

move his compassion: and, in words expressing great humility, they intreated his prayers in their behalf, and that he would enquire of the Lord what he would have them to do; seeing a very small remnant out of immense numbers, now remained. The prophet readily acquiesced; and doubted not that he should receive an answer from God, which he would unreservedly declare to them: (Notes, 1 Sam. iii. 16—18. Acts xx. 18—27, vv. 20. 27:) and they called the Lord to witness, that they would implicitly follow his directions, whatever they were, “that it might be well with them.”—The words, “Whether it be good, or whether it be bad,” rather may be thought to imply, that they supposed Jeremiah would answer according to his own discretion, rather than that he would deliver the unerring counsel of God: yet perhaps they only meant; whether his answer were coincident with their inclinations, or the contrary.—‘It is the constant method of hypocrites, to pretend a profound submission to the will of God, till that comes to cross their inclinations or interest.’ Lowth.—May shew, &c. (3) Notes, vi. 16, 17. 1 Kings viii. 35, 36. Ps. cxliii. 8—10.—A true and faithful witness. (5) Marg. Ref. 1.—Note, Rev. iii. 14—16, v. 14.

V. 7—9. (Marg. Ref.) The prophet waited for a revelation from God, in answer to the enquiries of the people; who saw good to delay for some time to make known his will; perhaps to shew them, that Jeremiah did not speak of his own mind, but when and as he was directed. The delay was also suited to give time for consideration, and to retard the execution of their rash projects: and, as it would render them impatient, it tended also to detect their hypo-

savage in their cruelty, to those who are not prepared to resist them, are often most cowardly when vigorously opposed.—The success of villany must be short lived: and though base murderers and traitors may for a time escape vengeance, yet “evil pursueth” and will certainly overtake them. But how soon may our most promising appearances of worldly prosperity vanish as a dream! And how impossible is it, that any can prosper, who harden their hearts against God!—The removal of a prudent, peaceable, and equitable ruler, and the succession of another, who is rash, turbulent, and enterprising, may affect the condition of great multitudes: so entirely do we in every thing depend on the providence of God! When men’s hearts are fixed on worldly projects and connexions, they will soon pretend or fancy some motive or reason for following their inclinations: and if the fear of man sometimes restrains from evil, it more frequently leads to rebellion and impiety. But they only are happy and steady, “who fear the LORD, and walk in his ways.”

NOTES.

CHAP. XLII. V. 1—6. It is not said, by what means Jeremiah escaped the sword of Ishmael; but the Lord took care of him according to his promises.—The princes seem to have wholly neglected him; till on this occasion, they wanted to obtain his sanction, to their purpose of going to Egypt.—In order to induce him to favour them, they applied to him with one consent, in the most respectful and plausible manner: they used language, suited to prepossess him with a favourable opinion of them, and to Johanan and the captains, despising the prophet's counsel, take him, and Baruch, and the people, and go into Egypt, 1—7. Jeremiah, by a sign, predicts the conquest of Egypt by the Chaldeans, 8—13.

AND it came to pass, that when Jeremiah ^a had made an end of speaking unto all the people ^b all the words of the LORD their God, for which the LORD their God had sent him to them, even all these words ;

when he delivered his message, seems to have indicated a determination to disobey it. He did not therefore shun to charge the matter home on their consciences, and to denounce the awful judgments of God against them ; though they had shewn him much respect, and had him entirely in their power. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, 18. xxvi. 12—15.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Numbers have a general persuasion, that the instructions given them from the word of God are right and good ; but they do not so decidedly believe them, as to yield obedience when self-denial is requisite : they however desire that faithful ministers should sanction their measures, and in urgent cases entreat an interest in their prayers. Many also learn the language of piety, and can, upon occasion, use it very plausibly : they profess great respect for the servants of God, and become their supplicants for their own selfish purposes : they impose upon them, and recommend themselves to their compassion and good-will ; and make them think, that they desire to “ know the way in which “ they may walk, and the thing that they may do.” There is, however, no harm done, if ministers entertain better hopes of men than they deserve ; provided they be only induced to pray for them, and to declare the word of God, without reserve or discouragement : for they should on all occasions be ready to do this for every one, whether great or small. But many, who promise, with much solemnity, to do whatever the Lord requires, so long as they can hope to have their pride flattered, and their favourite inclinations gratified ; cannot endure to be contradicted, or called to exercise self-denial : and generally, something in the language of such persons, betrays the state of their hearts to those, who “ have their senses exercised to discern good “ and evil.” For how could men, if they were not greatly attached to their own wills, suppose that the Lord would require of them any thing evil in itself, or prejudicial to them ? All his commands are holy, just, and good, however they may thwart our inclinations : and not only will it be well with us at last, if we “ obey the voice of the LORD “ our God ; ” but “ in keeping of his precepts there is “ great reward.”—Those who would know the mind of God in doubtful cases, must wait as well as pray. “ He “ that believeth will not make haste,” but will stay till he is satisfied, or obliged to decide : but unbelief and self-will are impatient ; and the Lord often delays to answer prayer, that he may distinguish betwixt the humble believer, who must wait at mercy's door till it be opened ; and the alarmed hypocrite, who, like Saul, will soon apply elsewhere, if he do not find the encouragement and success which he expected. (Note, 1 Chr. x. 13, 14.)—It is as vain as it is impious, to attempt imposing upon God. He will, however, always give encouragement to sinners, who apply for it in his appointed way. He is ever ready to return in mercy to those whom he has afflicted, and to pardon the penitent ; for “ he delighteth not in the death of a sinner, but rather that he should repent and live : ” and he never rejects those, who rely on his promises and obey his commandments.—Whatever loss or suffering we may sustain from obedience, it is provided against in his word : and he has engaged to protect and deliver all who trust and serve him. But if men will “ not abide his counsel,” or obey his voice ; if they will “ lean to their own understandings,” instead of trusting in his guidance ; (Note, Prov. iii. 5, 6 ;) if they will expect security from trouble and danger by disobedience, and obstinately pursue their worldly projects ; either the evils which they feared, or far worse, will come upon them, from which they will not be able to escape. And they, who copy the crimes of those, on whom “ the anger and fury of the Lord hath been “ poured out,” will in their turn also be made “ an execration, an astonishment, a curse, and a reproach.” These things must be urged on the consciences of men, without respect of persons ; nor must the servants of God shun to declare his whole counsel, out of regard to their rank, fear of their frown, or even gratitude for favours conferred on themselves. But no sinners should be rebuked with such sharpness, as those who have dissembled with God, in their solemn professions and enquiries after his will. This often appears in their conduct, for actions speak more plainly than words : and when it is thus made manifest, that “ they will not obey the voice of God,” they must be plainly told that his “ wrath abideth on them.”

4 So Johanan the son of Kareah, and all the captains of the forces, and all the people, ⁱ obeyed not the voice of the LORD, ^k to dwell in the land of Judah.

5 But Johanan the son of Kareah, and all the captains of the forces, ^l took all the remnant of Judah, that were returned from all nations, whither they had been driven, to dwell in the land of Judah;

6 Even men, and women, and children, and ^m the king's daughters, and every person that Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard had left with Gedaliah the son of Ahikam the son of Shaphan, ⁿ and Jeremiah the prophet, and Baruch the son of Neriah.

7 So they came into the land of Egypt; for they obeyed not the voice of the LORD: thus came they even to ^o Tahpanhes.

8 ¶ Then ^p came the word of the LORD unto Jeremiah in Tahpanhes, saying,

9 Take ^q great stones in thine hand, and hide them in the clay ^r in the brick-kiln, which is at the entry of Pharaoh's house in Tahpanhes, in the sight of the men of Judah;

10 And say unto them, Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; Behold, ^s I will send and take Nebuchadrezzar the king of Babylon, ^t my servant, and will set his throne upon these stones that I have hid: and he shall spread ^u his royal pavilion over them.

11 And when he cometh, ^x he shall smite the land of Egypt; and deliver ^y such as are for death to death; and such as are for captivity to captivity; and such as are for the sword to the sword.

12 And I will kindle a fire ^z in the houses of the gods of Egypt; and he shall burn them, and carry them away captives; and he shall ^a array himself with the land of Egypt, as a shepherd ^b putteth on his garment; and he shall go forth from thence in peace.

his enemies had done formerly, (xxxvii. 13,) but they lay the blame on Baruch.' Lowth.—The princes had previously made up their minds, at all events, to go into Egypt; and therefore they were decidedly averse to Jeremiah's counsel, because proudly attached to their own will and wisdom; and doubtless they were also exasperated by his severe language and awful warnings. They were, however, unwilling to allow, that they acted in direct defiance of God's authority; they pretended therefore, and perhaps persuaded themselves, that Jeremiah was influenced by Baruch to oppose their projects, that they might fall into the hand of the Chaldeans. Their suspicions of Baruch were doubtless ill-grounded; for he was a very pious man, and a steady friend to his people: (Marg. Ref.—Note, xlv. —3:) but Jeremiah's character was so established; he had so long shewn a patient, disinterested love to his nation, and so many of his predictions had already been fulfilled; that their accusation of him was as foolish as it was malicious. His late preference of a lot among them, to the favour of the king and princes of Babylon, was alone sufficient confutation of the slander. (Note, xl. 6.)

Put us, &c.] "Put us to death, or carry us, &c." That is, 'Put some to death, and lead the rest captive to Babylon.'

V. 4—7. (Marg. Ref. i—n.) Johanan, with the captains and soldiers, and those who concurred in his plans, seem to have compelled the rest of the company, as well as Jeremiah and Baruch, to accompany them into Egypt. This aggravated their impiety and rebellion; as they carried away those into that idolatrous country, (which had always proved treacherous to Israel,) who had returned from other nations out of affection to the land of Judah. When they arrived in Egypt, they repaired immediately to Tahpanhes, the royal city (9), where, it is probable, they were favourably received by Pharaoh. (Marg. Ref. o.)

V. 8—13. The Jews had sheltered themselves in Egypt, to be out of the reach of the Chaldeans: but they were no sooner arrived there, than the prophet was instructed to inform them, that Nebuchadnezzar would pursue them, and place his pavilion, or display his magnificence, near the palace of Pharaoh, so that he would not be able to protect them.—This prediction was attended by a sign, of which some of the Jews were made witnesses, that it might be the more noticed. (Notes, xiii. 1—11. xvi. 2—9. xviii. 1—10. xix.) It was also predicted, that Nebuchadnezzar would destroy great numbers of the Egyptians, and take many prisoners; (Note, xv. 2—4;) that he would add Egypt to his dominions, and possess himself of the spoil of it, with the utmost speed; and with as much ease, as a shepherd puts on his garment.—'This shews the prodigious ease with which all the power and riches of a kingdom are carried away, when God appoints the revolution.' Rollin. (Note, Ez. xxix. 17—20.)—Then he would return to his own land in peace, none daring to resist him: and he would burn their temples and idols, to which the Egyptians were attached beyond other nations, and which tempted the Jews also to idolatry. God, by his prophet, expostulates with the Jews in Egypt, for persisting in idolatry, after all that they had heard, suffered, and witnessed, 1—10. He denounces their destruction, 11—14. The Jews impiously avow their purpose of cleaving to their idols, and ascribe their miseries to the neglect of them, 15—19. The prophet shews the falsehood of their plea; and, in the name of God, predicts their utter ruin, 20—28; and, for a sign, that also of the king of Egypt, 29, 30.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS

Pride is the great root of infidelity, and proud men scorn subjection to any superior; they prefer their own wisdom to the revealed word of God; they resent warning, counsel, and reproof; they set up their own will in opposition to the divine authority, and justify themselves in the most flagrant enormities. When men of this character have resolved not to be ruled by the scriptures, they deny the divine original of them, notwithstanding the manifold demonstrations with which they are authenticated; they give credit to any absurdity, which seems to countenance infidelity; they impute the basest conduct to the most blameless and excellent characters; and the most unexceptionable actions to the worst motives. But they express most enmity against faithful ministers, whom they treat as deceivers, and charge with malevolence, and with being enemies to mankind. When thus bent on disobedience, they employ their ability, influence, or authority, in carrying others along with them in their rebellious courses: and the prospect of success, or carnal security, easily leads them into the most powerful temptations.—But vengeance pursues the obstinate rebel: while no banishment or distance from external advantages, can exclude the people of God from his presence, and the comfort of communion with him.—When he employs ambitious men to scourge guilty nations, they have easy and speedy success in their

CHAP. XLIV. V. 1. The Jews were now dispersed in different cities, probably according to the appointment of Pharaoh: and there they worshipped idols without restraint. Jeremiah was therefore commissioned to deliver a message from God to them; which he seems to have done at Pathros, to a multitude there assembled (15); but it would soon be circulated among those who lived in the other cities, which were not very distant.

V. 14. Scaliger observes, out of Eusebius, that Artaxerxes Ochus, making an expedition into Egypt, removed a considerable colony of Jews out of that country, and carried them away as far as the Caspian sea, and ‘there settled them. These, he thinks, were the remainder of those Jews, that went down into Egypt at this time.’ Lowth. As, however, Ochus’s conquest of Egypt occurred much more than two hundred years from the time of the Jews going into Egypt, this opinion is not very probable: nor do we read any thing more of this remnant, or of the fulfilment of this prediction.

None shall, &c.] The Jews, when they went into Egypt, supposed, that they might more easily return into their land, than their brethren at Babylon could: and they had a desire of returning, provided they could hope to be secured from the Chaldeans. But the Lord declared, that not one of them should return thither, “but such as should “escape:” which may mean such as should escape the contagion of idolatry; or a very mean and small remnant, escaping with immense difficulty from the general ruin. (Note, 28.) ‘None shall return into the land of Judah, but such as shall speedily withdraw themselves out of ‘Egypt, and make an escape from this wicked Johanan.’ Bp. Hall.—Perhaps a few of those, who went into Egypt by compulsion, or had previously fled thither, being preserved from idolatry, were afterwards restored, with their posterity, as “a remnant according to the election of “grace,” to their own land, when the Jews returned from Babylon; but not one of those, who went into Egypt with 15 ¶ Then ^kall the men, which knew that their wives had burned incense unto other gods, and all the women that stood by, a great multitude, even all the people that dwelt in the land of Egypt, in Pathros, answered Jeremiah, saying,

Johanan, willingly and in rebellion against God. (Note, 10—13, v. 12.)

V. 15—18. The women had, it seems, been more active in idolatry than the men: yet the men were enraged at the prophet's rebuke, and were determined to justify what their wives had done. After many evasions and excuses for their disobedience, they at length spake out; in the most impious manner declaring, that they would not regard the word, which the prophet had spoken to them in the name of God. (Notes, vi. 16, 17. xliii. 1—3. Ez. v. 2. 2 Chr. xxviii. 22, 23. Mal. iii. 13—18, vv. 13—15.) Either they meant to treat Jeremiah as a false prophet; or they were avowed in infidelity and impiety, they thought the service of JEHOVAH unprofitable and ruinous, and were determined to have no more to do with it.—They had vowed to burn incense to idols, and they would do that which had gone out of their mouth. (Marg. Ref. m.) This worship, they averred, had been of great antiquity and authority; for their fathers and their kings and princes had sanctioned it, not only in the cities of Judah, but in Jerusalem itself: nay, when this worship was observed, they had prospered in every respect; but since it had been put down, all their miseries had come upon them.—Nothing could be more irrational than this pretence: for the prophets, who had reprobated their idolatry, had also expressly predicted their calamities; and those who had favoured it, had promised them peace and prosperity. Indeed the Lord had long borne with them, till at length their measure of iniquity was filled; and then he executed vengeance upon them, because they cleaved in heart to their idols, even when they had it not in their power to worship them. (Notes, 20—23. Ec. viii. 11—13. ix. 1—3. Rom. ii. 4—6.)—Queen, &c. (17) Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Note, vii. 17, 18.

V. 19. This is supposed to have been the answer of the women, who took the prophet's rebuke to themselves, and were offended at him for it (15); and they pleaded, that they had not performed their worship, without the knowledge and concurrence of their husbands: yet, as the masculine participle is used, it seems the men joined in it.—'The vows of women were not binding, without the...consent of their fathers and husbands: but if the father, or husband knew of the vow, and did not signify his dissent at the time, his consent was presumed. (Num. xxx. 1—16.)...Since they were thus authorized by those who had a legal right to controul them; they should not submit to any other restraint upon their inclinations.' Blayney. This teacheth us how great danger it is, for the husband to permit their wives any thing, whereof they be not assured by God's word; for thereby they take occasion to justify their doings: and their husbands shall give an account thereof before God.'

sentment: so the Lord could no longer endure the provocations of his people; but his honour required him to take vengeance on them, and then the effects of his indignation became most dreadful, as the Jews well knew.

V. 24, 25. Marg. Ref.—Ye, &c. (25) The language of this verse is rendered very remarkable, by the interchange of the masculine and feminine verbs and pronouns; which implies, that the men, as well as women were criminal; the men by allowing the vow of the women, and these by making and performing it. (Notes, 15—19.) ‘They insist upon their unlawful vow, as an obligation in conscience, which could not be dispensed with; just as Herod did on his unlawful oath. (Matt. xiv. 9.)’ Lowth. (Notes, Matt. xiv. 8—11. P. O. 6—12.)

V. 26. (Marg. Ref.) ‘I have made a solemn vow in opposition to that wicked one of yours (25). ...I will consume them by a sudden and general destruction; or will deliver them up to impenitence and apostasy.’ Lowth. (Note, xxxiv. 17.)—My name, &c.] The Jews, amidst their idolatries, professed themselves the people of JEHOVAH, and would sometimes swear by his name: but he solemnly assured them, that he would so destroy them, that none of them should remain in the land of Egypt, to dishonour his name by this hypocritical use of it.—This must be understood of that rebellious company: for multitudes of Jews in after ages settled in Egypt, and openly professed and exercised their religion there. (Note, Is. xix. 18.)

V. 27. Notes, i. 9, 10. xxi. 8—10. xxxi. 27, 28.

V. 28. The word, rendered “that escape,” is translated in the Septuagint by the same word which St. Luke uses, when speaking of the success of the gospel: “The Lord added to the church daily such as should be saved,” the saved ones. (Note, 14.)—Shall know.] ‘Since they ‘are so peremptory in abiding by their own vows and resolutions, they shall see whose words shall stand good, or take effect, mine or their’s.’ Lowth.—The people rejected the Lord’s word of warning, of precept, and of promise; but his word of threatening stood out against them, and would certainly be executed. They established their own word, by performing their rebellious purposes; but they would not find those words take place, with which they promised themselves and each other impunity and prosperity in ungodliness. The event would in this respect shew whose words would stand, the Lord’s or their’s. (Notes, Num. xiv. 27—34. Zech. i. 5, 6. Matt. xxiv. 32—35, v. 35.)

V. 29, 30. (Notes, xliii. 8—13.) Pharaoh-hophra, (called Apries by the Greek historians,) after long prosperity, which elated him with the most excessive pride and arrogance, was dethroned in an insurrection headed by Amasis, who succeeded him: and, having concealed himself for a few years, he collected some forces, marched against Amasis, and gave him battle, in which being vanquished and taken prisoner, he was strangled in his own palace. Thus he was “given into the hands of his enemies and of those who sought his life,” as Zedekiah had been. (Note, Ez. xxix. 2—5.) In the time, which intervened between Pharaoh-hophra’s being dethroned and his death, Nebuchadnezzar invaded Egypt; and, having made immense destruction of the inhabitants, and taken a prodigious booty, he came to terms with Amasis, confirmed him in the kingdom as his deputy, and returned to Babylon; whither he is supposed to have taken those Jews, who survived the sword, or who were not slain by the enraged conqueror.—These events are computed to have occurred between the fourteenth and the nineteenth years of the captivity. (Notes, xlv. 13—26. Ez. xxix—xxxii.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14.

We ought frequently to recollect the miseries, of which we have heard, or which we have witnessed: seriously reflecting, that all suffering is the offspring of sin, and the effect of the divine wrath; and that frequently, it is the judgment of God on the sufferers, “because of the wickedness, which they have committed to provoke him to anger.” For sin is “that abominable thing which he hateth:” and every wilful transgression implies alienation of heart from him, as well as rebellion against him.—All our sorrows indeed originate from this source: yet the most awful miseries, to which men are exposed, are occasioned by their neglect of his great salvation. For, after all that he has done to open “a new and living Way,” for sinners to return to him; (Notes, Gen. iii. 22—24. John xiv. 4—6. Heb. x. 19—22;) the warnings, exhortations, and intreaties of his ministers generally prove unavailing, and numbers remain unwilling to be reconciled unto God: they persist in rebellion; they will not incline their ears or their hearts, to return to his worship and service; and their obstinate impenitence and unbelief are evils “committed against their own souls;” their “blood is upon their own heads,” and “they cut themselves off,” and “make themselves a curse and a reproach.”—To mingle idolatry with divine worship, and to reject the mediation of Christ, or join other mediators with him, are evils far more provoking to God, and ruinous to men, than it is generally supposed. (Note, Col. ii. 18, 19.) Those who worship images, saints, and angels, and “present oblations to the queen of heaven,” should recollect the consequences of similar practices of God’s ancient people, previous to the Babylonish captivity. And they, who neglect the person and mediation of the Son of God, should consider the punishment inflicted on the Jews, for rejecting and crucifying him; under which they still continue “a curse and a reproach among the nations:” because they “have not been humbled to this day,” nor have “feared the LORD,” to obey his command of “honouring the Son, even as they should honour the Father that sent him.” (Note, John v. 20—23.) Indeed all men, till humbled before God for their sins, are constantly exposed to the awful danger of being crushed by his power and justice.

V. 15—30.

If men remember the wickedness of former ages only to imitate it, they may expect even severer punishment than that which ancient rebels suffered: for neither rank nor sex will protect the workers of iniquity.—Such as neglect to use the authority entrusted with them, to restrain their own households from wickedness, will be punished as accomplices in their crimes: yet their connivance will not excuse those, who were thus emboldened to commit impiety and vice. (Notes, and P. O. 1 Sam. ii. 27—36. Note, 1 Tim. iii. 4, 5.)—Men ought not to expect, that God will grant even their lawful desires, when they refuse obedience to his commands: and all projects which are contrary to his word, must end in wretched disappointment, however politick and plausible they may appear.—The tendency of human depravity is from bad to worse; and sinners left to themselves grow continually more bold and insolent in impiety. Reproofs exasperate those, whom they do not convince and humble. Multitudes shew by their actions, that they will not hearken to the word of God; but will follow the devices and desires of their own evil hearts: and some dare to avow their purposes, and to “say to the Almighty, Depart from us, we desire not the knowledge of thy ways!” (Note, Job xxi. 7—16, vv. 14, 15.) They, who are thus hardened and blinded by Satan, are seldom at a loss for arguments and excuses for their conduct: and whilst the long-suffering of God towards sinners, and his judgments upon hypocrites, can supply them with reasons for the most abominable wickedness; they can never be without some apology. But such perverse inferences from providential dispensations are as absurd as unscriptural: and those who know the truth and will of God, can easily prove, that all our miseries spring from sin, all our comforts and hopes from God’s mercy; and that all our well-grounded persuasions of an interest in that mercy, are inseparably connected with repentance and the obedience of faith. Indeed ingenious infidels and ungodly men may perplex the plainest subjects: and they have been so numerous in all ages and places hitherto, and have possessed so much of the wealth, power, and wisdom of the world; that they have been able plausibly to plead antiquity, authority, and general consent, in support of their pernicious doctrines and vile abominations. Thus they encourage themselves and each other, to speak and act in direct defiance of the revealed will of God; to accomplish their iniquitous purposes; to vindicate what they have done; and to bear down the servants and worshippers of the Lord. But when we have borne testimony against them, and shewn the folly, wickedness, and fatal consequences of their conduct; we must leave the whole to him. He will assuredly plead his own cause, and the event will shew, whether the threatenings of the sacred scriptures, or their vain conjectures, will stand their ground. Nay, the punishment of those, who have countenanced, encouraged, and abetted their rebellion and impiety, will be a sign unto them, that the Lord’s word will stand against them for evil.

Judah, is properly a continuation of the thirty-sixth chapter : and the message was sent to Baruch nearly twenty years before those desolations were accomplished. (Notes, xxxvi. 1—4. 8—19.) Baruch was probably a young man, when employed to write "the words at the mouth of Jeremiah, and to read the roll at the temple ;" and though well disposed to the service of God, he had not sufficiently counted the cost. He had no doubt been grieved to write and read of the many and great calamities, which were coming on his people, and in which he was likely to be involved : but when he was persecuted for it by Jehoiakim, who sent to apprehend him, he complained, that "the "Lord added grief to his sorrow ;" and he was ready to faint with excess of disquietude and terror, from which he could find no rest.—Some think, that his distress followed immediately, when he had written the roll ; and that this message was sent to encourage him, previous to his reading of it.

V. 4, 5. Baruch, as a man of learning and ingenuity, probably had formed expectations of obtaining preferment, and was "seeking great things for himself." He had perhaps previously hoped, that the predicted judgments would not happen in his time ; and that by prudence and activity he should obtain the favour of his superiors. For this the Lord rebuked him. 'Dost thou aspire to honour
'and dignity, in a time of common calamity ?' Lowth.
God was about to break down the city and temple ; to pluck up the people from the land, in which he had planted them ; and to make dreadful destruction upon the Jews and neighbouring nations : and was this a time for one of his servants to "seek great things for himself ?" This was, (as one expresses it,) 'like painting his own cabin, 'whilst the ship was sinking.' (Notes, 2 Kings v. 26, 27.
Matt. xx. 17—23. 1 Cor. vii. 29—31.) He was therefore commanded to give up such worldly hopes and pursuits :
and he was assured, that the Lord would protect him from violence ; so that neither Jehoiakim, nor his successors, nor the Jews, nor the Chaldeans, should put him to death ;
but that he should be wonderfully preserved in all places, till his time should come to die, according to the ordinary course of nature. (Marg. Ref.—Note, xxi. 8—10, v. 9.)

the troubles of the most inconsiderable of his servants ; and he will reprove or encourage them, as he sees needful.
—We are all averse to the cross : but young converts, and inexperienced ministers, are most apt to be cast down by danger and opposition:—Our dejections are generally greater than there is cause for ; they always arise from weakness of faith and want of submission to the will of God ; and they commonly have in them a great mixture of undue attachment to external things. We are apt to indulge a hope of being considerable in one way or other, and to flatter ourselves with the prospect of reputation or affluence ; we are pleased with our own dreams, and put out of temper by being awaked out of them. But the Lord knows the real cause of our despondency better than we do : and we should beg of him to examine our hearts, and to enable us to repress and mortify every ambitious, covetous, or sensual desire.—In such a world of sin and sorrow, as this is at all times ; (and not only in seasons of publick calamity ;) where death is continually ravaging, and will speedily cut us off ; and which the Lord will soon break down and destroy, with all those whose treasures and hearts are in it ; we should not seek more than "food "convenient for us." (Notes, Prov. xxx. 7—9. Matt. vi.
11. 19—21. 1 Tim. vi. 6—10.) And, however our lives may be preserved or exposed, or whithersoever we may be driven, our chief diligence should be employed in obtaining an assurance, that "when this earthly house of our taber"nacle shall be dissolved, we have a building of God, a "house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

10 For this is ^t the day of the Lord God of hosts, a day of vengeance, that he may avenge him of his adversaries: and ^u the sword shall devour, and it shall be satiate, and made drunk with their blood: for the Lord God of hosts hath a sacrifice in ^v the north country by the river Euphrates.

11 Go up into ^w Gilead, and take balm, ^x O virgin, the daughter of Egypt: ^y in vain shalt thou use many medicines; for ^z thou shalt not be cured.

12 The nations have ^a heard of thy shame, and ^b thy cry hath filled the land: for the mighty man hath ^c stum-

on the Euphrates; as he returned home, he entered Jerusalem, carried Jehoahaz captive into Egypt, and left Jehoiakim upon the throne of Judah. (Notes, 2 Kings xxiii. 29—37. 2 Chr. xxxv. 20—27.) Some time after he raised a very great army, and marched into the same regions to extend his conquests. But this prophecy had been before delivered, in which his entire defeat by Nebuchadnezzar was predicted. This took place about the same time that Jehoiakim, the vassal or ally of Pharaoh, was carried captive to Babylon; who, making submissions to Nebuchadnezzar, was restored to his kingdom. (Notes, 2 Kings xxiv. 1—7. Dan. i. 1, 2.)

V. 3, 4. This is a poetical and ironical call to the Egyptians to muster their forces; and implies that all their courage and efforts would be in vain. (Notes, Is. viii. 9, 10. Joel ii. 7—17, vv. 7—11.)—Furbish, (4) Or "Make bright." (Note, Ez. xxi. 9, 10.)

V. 6. 'The words imply, that it was God's command, 'that none of the Egyptian army should escape.' Lowth. It is doubtless a prediction of the event, and not the prayer or imprecation of Jeremiah. (Marg. Ref. Is. xxx. 15—17. Am. ii. 14—16. ix. 1—4.)

V. 7, 8. 'He derideth the boastings of the Egyptians, 'who thought by their riches and power to have overcome 'all the world; alluding to the river Nilus, which at certain times overfloweth the country of Egypt.' (Notes, Ex. xv. 9, 10. Is. viii. 6—8. x. 8—11. Ez. xxix. 2—5. Dan. xi. 22, 23.)—Chaldea and Babylon seem especially meant, which Pharaoh-necho vainly expected to subjugate.

V. 9. Note, Nah. ii. 3—6.—Ethiopians, &c. 'These names in Hebrew are Cush, and Phut, and Lud, who were

'the Egyptians' allies, ... (Ez. xxx. 5,) which makes it probable that they are all Africans: Cush, though it often signifies Arabia, yet sometimes denotes Ethiopia. ... Phut is here rendered Lybia; ... but Phut and Lubim are spoken of as distinct people. (Nah. iii. 9.) Phut may probably signify Mauritania, and Lud, or Ludim, the people of Meroe. These were famous for the use of the bow. Is. lxvi. 19. Lowth. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, Gen. x. 6, 7. Ez. xxvii. 10, 11. xxx. 4, 5.)

V. 10. Pharaoh expected a day of victory and triumph: but the Lord intended a day of vengeance on him and on his army, and to make them a sacrifice to his offended justice; especially for their sin, in oppressing or deceiving Israel. (Notes, Ez. xxix. 6, 7. 16.)—'The day of the Lord' often signifies the day of his vengeance: ... from thence it comes to signify the day of judgment, in the New Testament, of which all other days of vengeance are the earliest nests and forerunners. ... The slaughter of men is called a 'sacrifice, because it makes some kind of satisfaction and 'atonement to God's justice.' Lowth. (Notes, Is. xxxiv. 3—8. Ez. xxxix. 17—20. Rev. xix. 17—21.)

V. 11. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, viii. 21, 22. xxx. 12—18.)—'He sheweth that no salve or medicine 'can prevail, where God giveth the wound.'

V. 12. The disgrace of being vanquished, is commonly as much dreaded by mighty and haughty monarchs and nations, as the actual loss or suffering. The pride of Pharaoh and the Egyptians would, however, soon be, in this respect, most deeply mortified. (Marg. Ref.)—This prophecy seems to have been fulfilled very soon after it was published. (Note, 2.) The Egyptians were routed with immense slaughter, which is predicted with great animation, and illustrated by most affecting and awful similitudes.

V. 13. The foregoing prophecy related to a great victory of Nebuchadnezzar over the king of Egypt, near the Euphrates: but this foretels the invasion of Egypt by the king of Babylon, and his entire conquest of that country. This took place about seventeen years after the destruction of Jerusalem. Probably, the prediction was delivered by Jeremiah, after he went down into Egypt. (Notes, xliii. —13. xlv. 29, 30. Is. xix. 1—17. Ez. xxix—xxxii.)

V. 14. Marg. Ref. f.—Stand, &c.] That is, 'Prepare to act upon the defensive, for Egypt will soon be invaded; the sword having already devoured all the adjacent regions.' (Marg. Ref. g, h.—Note, 3, 4.)

V. 15. 'The Hebrew word אַפִּיס rendered valiant, is sometimes spoken of God; (Gen. xlix. 24;) sometimes is a title given to angels; (Ps. lxxviii. 25;) and here the Septuagint understand it of Apis, the idol of Egypt.' Lowth. There is no reason to think, that this idol was intended; neither the mighty princes of Egypt; or, if the noun אַפִּיס should be in the singular number, as it is probable; (for both the verb and pronoun are singular;) then the thing himself may be intended. The LXX have, Διαλι εφυγεν ο σαρδ Απιδ; ο μοσχος ο ενλεκλος σαρδ ουκ εμεινεν. "Wherefore did Apis flee from thee? Thy elect calf abode not."—It is not improbable, that both the translation, and the interpolation, were intended as an attack on the Egyptian idolatry: an injudicious and criminal, even if a well intended measure; which has too often been imitated by those, who, to save a good cause, are not very scrupulous about the means which they employ. (Note, Rom. iii. 5—8.)

V. 16, 17. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Note, li. 9.) The cities of Egypt, finding themselves unable to maintain the conflict, and perceiving that Pharaoh, though he had boasted great things, was not punctual to his engagements in coming to their assistance, resolved to escape for their lives, and return home, if they were able. (Marg. Ref. n.—Note, viii. 20.)

V. 18. 'Mount Tabor is not more surely fixed among the rest of the mountains, nor Carmel more immoveably seated upon the sea-coast, than this word of mine is firmly fixed in heaven, and shall undoubtedly be performed. The king of Babylon shall come against Egypt.' Bp. Hall. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 19. Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Furnish, &c.] 'The expression is ironical, implying, that instead of the rich and goodly furniture, wherein she did pride herself, she should be carried away captive, naked and bare, and wanting all manner of conveniences. (Is. xx. 4. xlvii. 2, 3.)' Lowth. (Note, Ez. xii. 1—7.)

V. 20. 'In the foregoing verse, the prophet compared Egypt to a delicate young woman. Here he resembles her to a fat and well favoured heifer. (l. 11.)—In which comparison Grotius not improbably conjectures, there is an allusion to their god Apis, who was a bull remarkable for his beauty.' Lowth.—The last clause is very emphatical.—"Destruction from the north, it cometh, it cometh." (Marg. Ref.)

V. 21. Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, 16, 17. l. 27.

V. 22. Like a serpent.] The Egyptians would no longer utter boasting words; but in a more abject and timid manner express their terror and resentment, like a serpent hissing out of its hole, or when it is pursued. "An enchanter." Blayney. (Marg. Ref. d.—Note, Is. xxix. 3, 4.)—With axes, &c.] Marg. Ref. e.—Note, 23.

V. 23. The cities of Egypt were very many, and the inhabitants both exceedingly numerous and wealthy; but this would only render them the richer booty to the conqueror:

V. 24, 25. Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Multitude of No. (25) ‘The Hebrew word Ammon Minno, may be literally rendered Ammon of No. The same place is expressed in ‘Ezekiel by Hamon No. (xxx. 15.) And in Nahum it ‘is called No Amon. (iii. 8.)—The name is generally ‘thought to be derived from Jupiter Ammon, whose temple was there. ... It is rendered Diospolis by the Septuagint, which is the Greek name for Thebes, famous in ‘Homer’s time for its hundred gates.’ Lowth. (Notes, Ez. xxx. 14—19. Nah. iii. 8—11.) ‘“Ammon of No,” ‘signifies the deity of the place. ... From the similitude of ‘אֱמֹן and אֱמֹן, our translators, and others besides them, ‘have confounded them together. ... Ref. n.*—Note, Ez. xxix. 6, 7.

V. 26. (Notes, xliii. 8—13. xlv. 29, 30.) It is supposed that Pharaoh-hophra was slain by Amasis; but Amasis was at that time the deputy of Nebuchadnezzar, who was principally employed in executing the vengeance of God on the Egyptians.

Afterward, &c.] Nebuchadnezzar’s conquest of Egypt was preceded, attended, and followed, by violent internal convulsions and revolutions: and Egypt did not recover from these calamities, till about forty years afterwards. (Marg. Ref. p.—Notes, Ez. xxix. 8—15.)

V. 27, 28. (Note, xxx. 10, 11.) The Jews who had taken shelter in Egypt, were, with very few exceptions, devoted to destruction: (Notes, xlv. 14. 28:) but this repetition of the Lord’s former assurances to the nation of Israel, was intended to encourage the hopes of those in other places, who regarded his word, with the prospect of better times and returning and permanent tranquillity. (Notes, xxiii. 3—8. Is. xli. 10—16. xliii. 5—7. Ez. xxxiv. 23—31.)—The repetition, also, of so remarkable a promise, shews that it was considered as of very great importance, and should remind us of its remarkable accomplishment even to this day.—The words. “Fear not thou,

“O Jacob, &c.” as repeated in the concluding verse, gives the promise additional energy, and renders the passage peculiarly poetical. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS

Every part of scripture speaks terror to the impenitent and unbelieving, and comfort to those who obey the gospel.—The immense preparations, which in all ages have been made for the destruction of the human species, shew the power of Satan, the great “murderer from the beginning,” over our fallen race, by means of the pride, ambition, avarice, and revenge of the human heart: and likewise that God considers men as condemned criminals, whom he employs as executioners of each other, as he sees good. (Note, Num. xxxi. 2.)—Neither valour, strength, speed, nor numbers, can avail those, whom the righteous God determines to make sacrifices to his justice: but they must be dismayed, flee away, and not escape; and all their vain-glorious boasts and sanguine expectations, must end in disappointment and confusion.—Those who devise mischief against others, generally fall into it themselves: and the wounds, which God inflicts on his enemies, can be healed by no medicines.—How do power and prosperity pass from one to another in this changing world! Those nations which were “the terror of the mighty,” and seemed ready to obtain dominion over the whole earth, are speedily weakened that they cannot defend themselves! But no thing so exposes kingdoms to hostile invaders, as intestine discords; whilst mighty men thus stumble one against another, they all fall together; and the state becomes incapable of defending itself against the devouring sword of its enemies. (Notes, Is. xix. 2, 3. 11—14.)—When such events take place, when allies prove treacherous, and renowned princes and captains but a noise; when valiant men are swept away or put to flight, the hand of the Lord should be acknowledged: for how can they stand who he drives away? or be courageous, whom he surrounds with terrors? When his “day of visitation cometh,” the magnificence, luxury, and affluence of mighty nations vanish as a dream: and those who were sensual and strong, as fatted bullocks, fall an easy prey to every invader; and can no more resist them, than the forest can the axe of him that fells it. So that they, who trust themselves, or in “an arm of flesh,” must be confounded and punished.—But there is an appointed period to all earthly calamities: and therefore our grand concern is to “flee from the wrath to come.” Instead of “making provision for the flesh to fulfil the lusts thereof,” we should be daily preparing for death and judgment. Having sought reconciliation to our offended God through Jesus Christ, we should stand fast in the faith, and seek to be furnished with patience and hope against every event; for we know not what captivity, poverty, or tribulation may await us: and therefore habitual self-denial, and mortification to the world, constitute our highest wisdom, as well as our bounden duty. But nothing should dismay the servants of the Lord: he will save them from every place, where they have been scattered, and bring them to enjoy his rest and peace: he will be with them, and only correct them in measure; and will not punish any of them with that “everlasting destruction from his presence,” which awaits all impenitent transgressors.

NOTES.

CHAP. XLVII. V. 1. ‘Jeremiah had foretold, that the Philistines should be conquered by Nebuchadnezzar. ... (xxv. 20.) This probably came to pass, during the time of the siege of Tyre, which lasted thirteen years, as Josephus shews out of Philostratus, and the Phœnician annals. (4)’ Lowth.—The Philistines had repeatedly been subjected by the kings of Judah; but they had again recovered strength.—The prophecy was delivered “before Pharaoh took Gaza.”—‘This might probably happen, after Pharaoh’s victories at Megiddo and Carchemish, when Judea became tributary to him.’ Lowth. (Notes, xlv. 2. 2 Chr. xxxv. 20—24.) The Philistines seem to have been at that time in prosperity, and at peace with the Chaldeans. (Marg. Ref.)—Azzah. (Marg.) The original word is the same, when rendered Azzah, as when rendered Gaza: beginning with the same letter (7).

V. 2. Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, xlv. 7, 8. Gen. vii. 20—23. Ps. xxxii. 6, 7. Is. viii. 6—8. xiv. 28—32. Am. i. 6—10. Zeph. ii. 4—7. Zech. ix. 2—4.

V. 3. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, viii. 14—16. Nah. ii. 3—6.) The terrifying circumstances of this invasion would so dismay the Philistines, that they would not dare to look back, even to see what became of their own children. (Note, Lam. iv. 3—5.)

V. 4. Every helper, &c.] The destruction of the Philistines would tend to weaken the power of their confederates, the Tyrians and Zidonians; and to prepare the way for their subjection by Nebuchadnezzar. But some understand the words to signify, that the ruin of Tyre and Zidon, the helpers of the Philistines, would leave them without resource in their abject condition. (Notes, Ez. xxv. 12—17.)—Caphtor.] Marg. and Marg. Ref.

V. 5. This represents the total desolations of Gaza, which, with those of Ashkelon, would cause inconsolable grief to the inhabitants: this they would express, by tearing or shaving off their hair, and cutting their flesh. (Marg. Ref. m—o.—Notes, xvi. 5—7. xli. 4—8.)

Cut off.] “Put to silence.” Blayney. (Note, Job ii. 12, 13.)—Valley.] Between Gaza and Ashkelon was one of the most beautiful and fruitful valleys in the world.

V. 6. Some understand this verse as the words of the Philistines: but it is not likely, that they should consider Nebuchadnezzar, or the Chaldeans, as “The sword of JEHOVAH.” It is rather a most animated and pathetick lamentation of the prophet, over the miseries, which the just vengeance of God was inflicting on the nations for their sins. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, iv. 19—27. xii. 10—13. li. 20—24.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Men often apprehend no danger from that quarter, whence evil is appointed against them. (Notes, 2 Kings xx. 17, 18. Is. vii. 17—19.)—The height of ungodly prosperity is the fore-runner of destruction; and sinful pleasures terminate in out-cries and howlings of misery.—We should commit our children to the Lord's keeping; for we know not how soon we may be deprived of power, or heart, to take any care of them ourselves.—When he intends to destroy the wicked, he will "cut off every helper;" and where he inflicts vengeance, he will remove all consolation.—The miseries occasioned by war should be deeply lamented by us: and we should earnestly desire and pray, that this "sword of the LORD may return into the scabbard, and be still:" yet we should be ready humbly to acquiesce in his appointments, who, in perfect wisdom and justice, gives it commission, and will cause it to effect his purposes, notwithstanding all the power of those who attempt to arrest its progress. 9 Give ¹ wings unto Moab, that it may flee and get away: for ² the cities thereof shall be desolate, without any to dwell therein.

11 ¶ Moab ¹ hath been at ease from his youth, and ² he hath settled on his lees, and hath not been ³ emptied from vessel to vessel, neither hath he gone into captivity; ⁴ therefore his taste remained in him, and his scent is not changed.

12 Therefore, behold, the days come, saith the LORD, that I will send unto him ¹ wanderers that shall cause him to wander, and shall ² empty his vessels, and break their bottles.

13 And Moab shall be ¹ ashamed of Chemosh, ² as the house of Israel was ashamed of Bethel their confidence.

15 Moab is ¹ spoiled, and gone up out of her cities, and ² his chosen young men are ³ gone down to the slaughter, ⁴ saith the King, whose name is the LORD of hosts.

16 The calamity of Moab is ¹ near to come, and his affliction hasteth fast.

17 All ye that are about him, ¹ be-moan him; and all ye that know his name, say, ² How is the strong staff broken, and the beautiful rod!

18 Thou ¹ daughter that dost inhabit ² Dibon, come down from thy glory, ³ and sit in thirst, for the spoiler of Moab shall come upon thee, and he shall destroy thy strong holds.

19 O ¹ inhabitant of ² Aroer, stand by the way, and espy; ³ ask him that fleeth, and her that escapeth, and say, What is done?

20 Moab is ¹ confounded; for it is broken down: howl and cry; tell ye it in ² Arnon, that Moab is spoiled,

21 And judgment is come upon ¹ the plain country; upon Holon, and upon ² Jahazah, and upon Mephaath,

22 And upon ¹ Dibon, and upon Nebo, and upon ² Beth-diblathaim,

V. 10. The Chaldeans were commissioned to execute vengeance on Moab; and they would expose themselves to vengeance, if they did it partially, and only by halves. This emphatically denoted, that God would effectually take care for the performance of his word; and would find instruments, who would not "keep back their swords from blood." (*Marg. V. 11. The nation of Moab, though small, was very ancient, and had for many ages continued independent and prosperous. It had experienced few of those violent convulsions and revolutions, with which the surrounding nations had been harassed: and though the Moabites seem to have suffered grievous calamities, some years before; (Note, 1;) yet they had not been carried out of their land by repeated captivities, as Israel and Judah had been; and they had recovered their strength and prosperity before this time. They were, therefore, like wine left long to refine and feed on the lees; which becomes much stronger, than when frequently emptied from vessel to vessel. Having met with little disturbance, they became proud, presump-tuously, secure, and sensual; indulging in wickedness habitually, and from age to age, without any degree of reformation. (Notes, Is. xxv. 6-8. Zeph. i. 12.)

V. 12. The Chaldeans would march far from home, under the secret direction of God, to conquer the Moabites, and to carry them away captive into a distant country; desolating their cities, wasting their country, and destroy ing all that they had gloried in.

24 And upon ^a Kerioth, and upon ^a Bozrah, and upon all the cities of the land of Moab, far or near.

25 The ^b horn of Moab is cut off, and his arm is broken, saith the LORD.

26 ¶ Make ^d ye him drunken; ^e for he magnified himself against the LORD: Moab also shall ^f wallow in his vomit, and he also shall be in derision.

27 For ^h was not Israel a derision unto thee? ⁱ was he found among thieves? for since thou spakest of him, thou ^{*}skippedst for joy.

28 O ye that dwell in Moab, ^k leave the cities, and dwell in the rock, and be ^l like the dove that maketh her nest in the sides of the hole's mouth.

29 ¶ We have ^m heard the pride of Moab, (he is exceeding proud,) ⁿ his loftiness, and his arrogancy, and his pride, and the haughtiness of his heart.

30 I ^o know his wrath, saith the LORD; but it shall not be so; ^p his lies shall not so effect it.

31 Therefore ^q will I howl for Moab and I will cry out for all Moab; mine heart shall mourn for the men of ^r Kir-heres.

32 O ^s vine of Sibmah, I will weep for thee with the weeping of ^t Jazer: thy plants are gone over the sea, they reach even to the sea of Jazer: ^u the 33 And ^x joy and gladness is taken from the plentiful field, and from the land of Moab; and I have ^y caused wine to fail from the wine-presses: none shall tread with shouting; their shouting shall be no shouting.

35 Moreover I will cause to cease in Moab, saith the LORD, ^f him that offereth in the high places, and him that burneth incense to his gods.

36 Therefore ^g mine heart shall sound for Moab like pipes, and mine heart shall sound like pipes for the men of ^h Kir-heres; because ⁱ the riches that he hath gotten are perished.

38 There shall be lamentation generally ⁿ upon all the house-tops of Moab, and in the streets thereof: for I have ^o broken Moab like a vessel wherein is no pleasure, saith the LORD.

39 They shall howl, saying, ^p How is it broken down! how hath Moab

V. 27. The Moabites exceedingly rejoiced at the calamities of Israel, and insulted over the sufferers; as thieves are sometimes derided when apprehended in the fact: but the sufferers had not injured them, and their joy arose from malice, envy, and enmity against the God of Israel. This appears a just translation of the last clause.

V. 28. Marg. Ref.—Notes, 6. Cant. ii. 14.—Sides, &c.] That is, "On the edge of the precipice." Blayney.

V. 29, 30. Isaiah brought this same charge against Moab; but their pride grew more and more intolerable.

(Note, Is. xvi. 6.) The several expressions here employed, denote the various ways, in which the Moabites shewed their insolence and arrogance; especially it appeared in their haughty indignation against Israel, and their slanders, and ostentatious boastings of what they would do against them: but the Lord knew all their purposes and dissimulation, and would take care that they should not succeed. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.)—"The word baddim," rendered lies, "sometimes means those who pretend to the arts of divination. ... If we take the word in this sense, (1. 36.) the meaning of the sentence is, that although the soothsayers and magicians, upon whose skill Moab relies, promise him good success, and thereby encourage his pride and arrogance; yet in the event it will appear, that there was nothing of truth in what they said." Lowth.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS

V. 1—25.

Woe be to all those, against whom the LORD of Hosts has spoken! They can expect nothing but terror and confusion; all their praise and honour must expire in infamy; they who devise evil against them will succeed according to their wishes; the sword of justice will pursue them; weeping and bitter wailing will attend their great destruction; and generally, their children will be involved in calamities on their account.—There is indeed a Refuge provided for sinners: and the exhortation should be urged on them with all earnestness "to flee from the wrath to come," to seek the salvation of their souls, and to forsake all for Christ and the gospel; as men in perilous circumstances, part with all their substance to save their lives. But the case of obstinate unbelievers is very dreadful; for "how shall we escape, if we neglect so great Salvation?"—Those who trust in their own works, treasures, or superstitions, will soon be overtaken by the vengeance of God, and will go into destruction, along with their idols and deceivers, and will for ever be made ashamed of their confidences.

 No guilty city, village, or individual, shall be able to escape the ruin, which the Lord has spoken against them:
 and if any could "give wings" to sinners, they could not fly out of the reach of the divine indignation. (Note, Ps. cxxxix. 9, 10.)—Whatever God enjoins us must be done heartily, and according to his word, if we would escape his curse. We should indeed be thankful, that we are required to seek the preservation of men's lives, and the salvation of their souls, and not to shed their blood: but we shall be the more inexcusable, if we do this "work de-ceitfully," preferring our own interest, credit, inclination, or indulgence, to the glory and will of God: and it is great insolence, for man to pretend to be more merciful than his Creator.—When men continue long in peace, wealth, and prosperity, and escape the calamities which others experience; they are apt to grow insensible and secure; to contract habits of pride, impiety, iniquity, and self-indulgence; to cleave without remorse to evil practices, and to proceed from bad to worse: so that great prosperity is peculiarly dangerous to us as fallen creatures.
 But when the Lord's time comes, he will send upon sinners, who are thus "settled on their lees," such judgments, as will dash their comforts and hopes in pieces. In vain do men say, that they are "mighty and strong for the bat-

* CONCERNING ^a the Ammonites, thus saith the LORD; Hath Israel no sons? hath he no heir? why then doth their ^b king inherit Gad, and his people dwell in his cities? 2 Therefore, behold, the days come, saith the LORD, ^c that I will cause an “tle:” when “the King the LORD of Hosts” has a controversy with a people, their young men go down to the slaughter, rather than to battle; and all the beauty and strength of nations, only tend to increase the astonishment of those, who bemoan their ruin, and exclaim, “How is “the strong staff broken and the beautiful rod!” Every circumstance, which increased their glory, now enhances their misery: and every enquiry about what is done, makes known their terror and distress. But “the LORD is righteous in all his ways, and holy in all his works:” and he does not “cut off the horn and break the arm” of any, except of such as “magnify themselves against him.”

V. 26—47.

When sinners become intoxicated with pride and ungodly lusts, the Lord will make them drunken with his judgments, and expose them to shame and derision. He abhors those, who rejoice in the calamities of their neighbours, and insult over the miserable, especially over his inoffensive worshippers: yet this is the general effect of the envy, malice, selfishness, and impiety of the human heart. But pride, in its multiplied exercises, is the fruitful root of unnumbered crimes; and when this diabolical vice grows stronger continually, disgrace and ruin are at hand: for “a haughty spirit goes before a fall;” and the Lord knows the rage, malice, deceit, and lies of his enemies, and will disappoint them.—It becomes us to compassionate the sufferings even of our enemies: when “joy and gladness are “taken away from the plentiful field;” when penury and famine succeed luxury and abundance, and the riches of those who once lived in splendour are perished; we should sympathize in their sorrows, and be ready to afford them such relief as we are able. But we should also take warning to avoid their transgressions: and amidst the changes and calamities which surround us, we should learn to “set “our affection on things above, and not on things on the “earth.” If our sins be pardoned and our hearts renewed, our God will preserve us from every fear, pit, and snare, into which others fall: and whilst “the vessels of wrath,” in whom he has no pleasure, and which are “fitted for “destruction,” shall perish for ever; he will effectually take care of those “vessels of mercy, whom he hath afore “prepared for his glory.” (Note, Rom. ix. 22, 23.)

intended to revenge that injury, when he made war against the Ammonites: (Notes, xl. 13—16. xli. 16—18:) but the Lord had a controversy with them, on account of their injustice to his people. Being situated on the north east border of the country allotted to Israel, the Ammonites seized every opportunity of seizing on the cities and lands adjacent to their territory, as if the Israelites had no heirs: and thus the subjects of the king of Ammon, or the worshippers of Melcom the idol of Ammon, (marg.) dwelt in the lot of Gad, and in the cities which God had given to his people, and which had never belonged to the ancestors of the Ammonites. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Judg. x. 6—9. 17, 18. xi. 12—27. 1 Sam. xi. 1—3. 2 Chr. xx. 1, 2. 10, 11. Ps. lxxxiii. 1—8. Ez. xxv. 2—11.)—It seems that their rapacity was on some occasions attended with the most atrocious and savage cruelty. (Note, Amos i. 13—15.) Even before the Syrians and Assyrians had dispossessed the Israelites, several cities, originally given to Gad or Reuben, were possessed by the Ammonites; for the names of several cities first given to the two tribes and a half, are elsewhere found among those possessed by the Ammonites: (Note, 3:) but they then seized on them with less reserve. name of that which the Amorites took from Moab, might not be intended.—The kingdom of Sihon was divided between Reuben and Gad: Heshbon was at first allotted to Reuben; but it is afterwards mentioned as a city of Gad: Num. xxxii. 34—38. Josh. xiii. 15—21. xxi. 34—42: so that either Moab or Ammon had taken it from Reuben or Gad.—Heshbon is mentioned by Isaiah, as a city of Moab; as are several others, which had been given to Reuben and Gad: (Comp. Num. xxxii. 34—38, and Josh. xiii. 15—28, with Is. xv. xvi.) but Heshbon, as a city of Ammon, is not elsewhere mentioned.
Run to, &c.] ‘Try to hide yourselves in the thickets, and remove from one place to another, for fear of being discovered.’ Lowth.—Their king, &c.] Or, Melcom. Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, 1. xlviii. 7. Zeph. i. 5.)
V. 4. The Ammonites gloried, either in the security of their valleys, as surrounded on every side with mountains, so that no army could penetrate into their country; or in the fruitfulness of them: one in particular was called “the flowing valley;” as resembling Canaan that flowed with milk and honey.—Ammon is called a “backsliding daughter,” either as having apostatized from the religion of the ancestor of the nation; or rather as refractory and rebellious; for so the word may signify. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Is. xxviii. 1—4. xlvii. 7—10.)
V. 5. Marg. Ref.—Note, Is. xxiv. 17—20.—Ye shall be driven, &c.] ‘So as not to dare to look back. ... None shall bring him that flees from the enemy to his house, nor afford him any shelter or accommodation.’ Lowth. Notes, xlvii. 5, 6. Is. xvi. 3—5.)
V. 6. (Note, xlviii. 47.) It is observable, that the Septuagint leave out these intimations of mercy in reserve to the descendants of Moab and Ammon; though that concerning Elam is not omitted (39).—‘The conversion of idolaters is expressed, by returning from their captivity.’ Lowth. (Note, Ez. xvi. 52—55, v. 53.)
V. 7. (Marg. Ref.)—Eliphaz, the friend of Job, was a Temanite; (Note, Job ii. 11;) and it is probable, that the descendants of Esau were among those children of the east, who in Solomon’s days were famed for wisdom: (1 Kings iv. 30:) but, ‘when God designs a people for destruction, he deprives them of that common prudence and foresight, which is requisite for the due management of their affairs; and takes from them their usual courage, so that a “thousand flee at the rebuke of one.”’ Is. xix. 11, 12, &c.)’ Lowth. (Notes, Is. xix. 11—14. xlvii. 7—11. Ob. 7—9.)

“Hath their wisdom overshot itself?” חסד signifies to be redundant or luxuriant, like the branches of a vine. Hence Dr. Taylor has explained this passage, “Is their wisdom become luxuriant? Doth it shoot out into proud, vain, foolish conceit?”’ Blayney.
V. 8. Ezekiel mentions Dedan twice, in his account of those, who traded with Tyre: in one place he speaks of the Dedanites, the descendants of Dedan, the son of Abraham by Keturah; in the other, as it is probable, of those who inhabited Dedan, a city in Idumæa. (Gen. xxv. 3. Ez. xxvii. 15. 20.)
Dwell, &c.] That is, ‘Retire into your caverns and fastnesses to secure yourselves, for there will be no security in the open country, or even in the cities.’ (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, 9—11. Judg. vi. 2, 3. Is. ii. 19—21.)
V. 9—11. (Note, Ob. 3—6.) Grape-gatherers generally leave some gleanings; and nocturnal depredators take what they can, or till they are sufficed, (marg.) and have as much as they can carry off, yet do not destroy every thing: but the Chaldeans, whom God employed to desolate Edom, would entirely spoil them; they would discover and plunder their secret treasures, and leave them no refuge to hide in and they would so destroy their seed, and brethren, and neighbours; that there would be none left to say to those that were dying, ‘Leave thy orphans and widows to my care, and I will provide for them.’ (Notes, Ps. cxxxvii. 7—9. Is. xxi. 11, 12. Lam. iv. 21, 22. Ez. xxv. 12—14. xxxv. Am. i. 11, 12. Mal. i. 2—5.) This seems the most natural meaning of the eleventh verse in this connexion; though it is generally quoted as

12 For thus saith the LORD, Behold, ^k they whose judgment was not to drink of the cup, have assuredly drunken; and art thou he that shall altogether go unpunished? thou shalt not go unpunished, but thou shalt surely drink of it.

13 For ^l I have sworn by myself, saith the LORD, that ^m Bozrah shall become ⁿ a desolation, a reproach, a waste, and a curse; and all the cities thereof shall be perpetual wastes.

14 I have ^o heard a rumour from the LORD, and ^p an ambassador is sent unto the heathen, saying, ^q Gather ye together and come against her, and rise up to the battle.

15 For, lo, ^r I will make thee small among the heathen, and despised among men.

16 Thy ^s terribleness hath deceived thee, and the pride of thine heart, O thou that ^t dwellest in the clefts of the rock, that holdest the height of the hill: ^u though thou shouldest make thy nest as high as the eagle, I will bring thee down from thence, saith the LORD.

17 Also ^v Edom shall be a desolation: every one that goeth by it shall be astonished, and ^x shall hiss at all the plagues thereof.

18 As ^y in the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah, and the neighbour-cities thereof, saith the LORD, ^z no man shall abide there, neither shall a son of man dwell in it.

19 Behold, ^a he shall come up like a lion from ^b the swelling of Jordan against the habitation of the strong: but I will suddenly make him run away from her: and who is a chosen man, that I may appoint over her? for ^c who is like me? and who will ^d appoint me the time? and who is ^e that shepherd that will stand before me?

20 Therefore hear ^f the counsel of the LORD, that he hath taken against Edom; and his purposes, that he hath purposed against the inhabitants of Teman: ^g Surely the least of the flock shall draw them out; surely he shall ^h make their habitations desolate with them.

a promise to the people of God, when about to leave the world: and some suppose, that it was intended for the afflicted Israelites, to remind them of the advantages which they possessed above the Edomites.—Some indeed understand it ironically, as if no orphans or widows would remain, about whom the dying Edomites need be concerned: but so entire a massacre does not often take place; and such a way of predicting so dire an event, does not accord with the general serious and solemn manner of the holy scriptures. “Shall I preserve the life of thy fatherless children? Or shall thy widows trust in me?” Blayney.

V. 12. (Notes, xxv. 27—29. xxx. 10, 11. Ex. xxxiv. 5—7. Lam. iv. 21, 22. Ob. 15, 16.) Israel, the people of God might, on some accounts, have expected an exemption from the calamities, which overtook his enemies; yet they had been deeply involved in them: and could the Edomites hope to escape?—Not the character, but the peculiar privileges of the Israelites were alluded to. (Notes, Prov. xi. 31. 1 Pet. iv. 17—19.)

V. 13. Marg. Ref.—Notes, 9—11. Is. xxxiv. lxiii. 1—6.

V. 14, 15. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Is. xviii. 2. Ob. 1, 2.) ‘God’s stirring up men’s spirits to invade such countries’ is described here, as if he had sent an ambassador to the Chaldeans and their confederates, to engage them in the war against the Idumæans: according to the methods, which earthly princes use to engage their allies. (li. 27, 28.) Lowth.

V. 16. The word rendered terribleness is, by some, supposed to mean an idol worshipped by the Idumæans, from which they expected help, but which would disappoint their confidence.—‘Jerom, who lived in the neighbourhood, tells us, in his commentary on Obadiah, that Idumæa was a rocky mountainous country; and that the inhabitants dwelt in caves dug out of the rocks and hills. Lowth. (*Marg. V. 19, 20. Nebuchadnezzar was about to come up, as a lion from the banks of Jordan, when driven from his den by the overflowing waters, he fiercely assaulted the sheepfolds; (Note, Zech. xi. 1—3, v. 3;) and the LORD will cause him suddenly to run upon the land of Edom, though it was strongly fortified: or he would cause the Edomites, every one of them, suddenly to run out of the land, as despairing of success against so powerful an invader. For God had, as it were, summoned all the valiant captains of the earth to appear before him, that he might appoint one of them to this service; and from them as he had chosen Nebuchadnezzar. And who, like JEHOVAH, was able to prepare instruments to his work? Who dare to appoint him a time, either to meet him in judgment, or to face him in battle, or to fulfil his counsels and decrees? Or, what ruler of Edom would dare to withstand him, and the weapons of his indignation? “Who shepherd could meet this fierce lion, to defend the sheepfold against him? PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—22.

The Lord notes down every instance of dishonesty, and will call men to an account for the whole; and especially for all their injustice to the destitute and orphans, who are not able to defend their own property. Power may for a time overcome right: but he will cause the injurious to make ample restitution for all their ill-gotten wealth.—The commission of iniquity, nay, the connivance at it, by those in authority, causes the alarm of war, with all its desolations, to be heard in the land: and it is a serious enquiry, whether an account of this kind do not stand out against this nation, at least in respect of several of our foreign dependences? and whether they may not be made heirs to our wealth in those remote regions, who have been unjustly deprived by us of their inheritances?—It is in vain for those who rebel against God, to glory in fruitful fields, and “flowing valleys;” or to trust in fleets, armies, treasures, or advantageous situations. His terror can make even the stoutest to flee: and at his word, kings, princes, and priests must go into captivity together. But, however the people of God may be plundered and injured, they will “inherit the earth,” and “the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just.”—Wisdom and counsel cannot be preserved from vanishing and perishing, when the time of God’s visitation comes. By a blow, or a fever, the finest genius may be rendered an idiot, and the gravest statesman a lunatick. Even when men’s faculties are preserved, their counsel may be so infatuated, that they may appear as fools and madmen to all around them: and, in short, without true piety there can be no valuable or durable wisdom.—When the Lord lets loose victorious armies to spoil guilty nations, they often cause tremendous desolations, not only for the sake of plunder, but out of wanton cruelty: then the inhabitants are driven into dens and caves, or hunted out of their fastnesses, and cut off by the devouring sword: and the case of widows and fatherless children is very deplorable. But the Lord has given gracious intimations of his special care of them: and if the dying believer have neither friend nor brother, to take charge of those whom he leaves behind; if he can make no provision for them, nor direct them to any earthly protection; he may be satisfied in hearing his God and Saviour say to him, “Leave thy fatherless children, and I will preserve them alive, and let thy widows trust in me.” This is “a strong tower into which the righteous may flee,” and be safe in every emergency; but no secret places can hide the sinner from the wrath to come. And if the children of God here drink the bitter cup of affliction, can prosperous rebels expect to escape “altogether unpunished?” Indeed the Lord has sworn by himself, that they shall drink the cup of his vengeance to the very dregs, and “wring them out; and that they shall become “a reproach, and a curse, and “a desolation.”—God will make those small among the nations, and despised among men, who exalt themselves against him and his people.—When nations grow formidable to their neighbours, and eminent in power and prosperity; their pride often deceives them; they deem themselves like the eagle, which has made “her nest in the top of the rock,” and forget that God can easily bring them down from thence. He is as powerful, and as holy as when he overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah: he can easily destroy this guilty land, as he did those devoted cities; and make it an astonishment and a hissing to:

that go by. It is therefore immensely safer to trust his promises, by penitent faith, and in humble obedience, than to rely on our advantages and to commit iniquity. He can choose from the whole earth the most proper person for his work; or he can form one on purpose, as he pleases. “Who then is like unto the LORD? Who can stand in judgment before him? Who hath hardened his heart against him and prospered?” He needs not the powerful of the earth to execute his vengeance: when his purposes are to be fulfilled, the feeblest instrument may prevail against the most potent of his enemies; and the earth shall be moved at the sound of their fall, whilst their “hearts melt, as the heart of a woman in her pangs.”

V. 23—39.

Divine judgments continually go round from nation to nation: dismal tidings are heard: the earth is full of commotion, and cannot be quiet: admired and joyous cities are desolated, and their splendid palaces are consumed: and those who dwell in tents, and have neither gates nor bars, cannot escape the rapacity of the executioners of divine vengeance. In all these events, the righteousness of God should be observed, amidst the violence and injustice of men. He “sits on his throne judging right:” by his judgments he shews his own holiness and the evil of sin, and gives an earnest of the day of future righteous retribution. He thus calls sinners to repentance; he confirms the faith and hope of his people, and warns them not to abuse his mercy: and they learn not to fear any purposes of man against them, when they can rejoice in the assurance, that “the LORD of hosts is with them, the God of Jacob is their Refuge;” and to expect, that by all these convulsions and revolutions, way will be made for the more complete establishment of the Redeemer's kingdom, “in the latter days,” when peace, holiness, and truth shall fill the whole earth.

NOTES.

CHAP. L. V. 1. (Notes, xxv. 12—36. li. 61—64.) The Chaldeans had been employed as the scourge of God against all the surrounding nations: but it was his purpose, that they should be made a still more tremendous example of the power of his wrath, and the truth of his word. Their crimes were more enormous than those of the other nations: and they were the most grievous oppressors which Israel had then ever had. (Notes, li. 33—37. Deut. xxviii. 49—57. Is. xlvii. 6. xlix. 24—26.)—“This follows the rest of the prophecies against the neighbouring countries, according to the method of God's judgments laid down before; (xxv. 12, 13;) where the prophet declares, that after Nebuchadnezzar and his successors had fulfilled God's purposes, in being executioners of his vengeance upon other countries; they themselves should drink of the same cup. The prophecy has a farther aspect on that mystical Babylon, mentioned in Revelation, and many expressions of it are applied by St. John to the downfall of Antichrist.” Lowth. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, &c. Is. xiii. xiv. xxi. xxvi. xlvii. Rev. xiv—xix.)—By, &c.] “By the ministry of Jeremiah.” Old Version.

V. 2, 3. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, Is. xiii. 19—22. xiv. 21—23. xxi. 6—9. xxxix. 1. xlv. 1, 2. Zeph. ii. 11. Rev. xiv. 8. xvii. 1—5. xviii. 1—3.) The ruin of Babylon was here predicted, as if it had already taken place. Notice was particularly taken of the destruction of the idols of Babylon: for that city was renowned for her idols and the immense treasures dedicated to them; and the Persians destroyed all images wherever they came, and plundered all the treasures contained in their temples: for they worshipped the sun under the emblem of fire; or, as some think, an invisible supreme God, under the external symbols of fire and of the sun.—Chaldea lay more towards the north than Judea; but the Medes and Persians came from the north of Chaldea. The Pagan Roman empire was subverted by the northern nations: and probably the ruin of the antichristian powers will come upon them from the same quarter.—The destruction of Babylon, which was begun by the Medes and Persians, became at length so entire, that it has for ages been uninhabited by man, and deserted by every useful animal. This prophecy was delivered when Babylon was rapidly becoming more and more powerful and prosperous.

V. 4—6. The restoration of the Jews, and of many Israelites with them, to their own land, was closely connected with the subversion of the Babylonish monarchy: and the more extensive promulgation of Christianity, attended with the conversion of the Jews, will be as intimately connected with the ruin of the New Testament Babylon: but some think that the future conversion of the Jews, and their restoration to their own land are also predicted, to which the mention of Israel, with Judah, gives much support.—The people are represented, as convinced of their guilt, their duty, and their true interest: so that, weeping for their former sins and for joy on account of their happy deliverance, they go “to seek the LORD their God:” they determine to leave Babylon and return to Zion, according to the liberty given them by Cyrus. (Marg. Ref. m—p.—Notes xxxi. 8, 9. Ezra i. Is. xliiii. 5—7. xlv. 12, 13. xlviii. 20—22.) Being unacquainted with the road, they enquire about it, as travellers who have turned their faces in that direction, being already set out and determined to proceed; and they invite their brethren to go with them, and encourage each other to go forward; that on mount Zion they may “join themselves to the LORD,” and renew their acceptance and confirmation of his covenant, which was perpetually in force and obligatory: that (as fully persuaded he would not fail to perform it with them,) they might engage themselves not to forget to walk with him according to it. (Marg. Ref. q—s.)—The covenant entered into by Josiah and the people, which was speedily forgotten and violated, may be referred to. (Note, 2 Kings xxiii. 3.)—Then the Lord mercifully considers the former sufferings of his people. Their rulers and teachers, who should have fed and attended them as the flock of God, had occasioned their dispersion, by seducing them to idolatry. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. t—z.—Notes, v. 30, 31. xxiii. 13—15. Is. ix. 13—17. Ez. xxii. 25—31.)—‘They have turned them aside from the right worship of God...at Jerusalem; to sacrifice to idols on mountains and high places.’ Lowth. Thus they were exposed, as lost sheep, to be devoured by their enemies, who were like wolves and lions: and they had not thought of returning to their resting-place, to God and to his worship.

Come, &c. (5) Note, Is. ii. 2—5.—"They shall come, "and shall join themselves," &c. Blayney. This seems the more literal translation.—A perpetual covenant, &c.] The original words are the same, as are elsewhere trans-

V. 7, 8. (Notes, II. xii. 7—13. xl. 2, 3. Ps. lxxi. 10, 11. Is. xlvii. 6. Lam. iv. 13—16. Zech. xi. 4—6). The Chaldeans, having heard that the Lord was punishing the Jews for their sins, supposed that they did not offend by destroying them. They allowed, that JEHOVAH had in former times been “the Habitation of justice,” the sure Protector of the righteous, and “the Hope of the fathers” of the Jews; (Note, xxxi. 23—26;) but they thought that he would not defend such wicked persons, or punish those who spoiled and murdered them: as if they had been free from sin; or as if they had sought the glory of God, or acted in obedience to his commandment, and in support of his righteousness, when they fought against that nation! But as the Lord had now taken vengeance on these oppressors of his people, the Jews were ordered to leave Babylon; and the leading men to go before others, as the he-goats before the flock, without fearing any obstruction or opposition. ‘Let every one strive to lead the way to others, and give them an example of speedily obeying God’s call, without shewing any fondness for the place, or the idolatries there practised.’ Lowth. (Notes, 4—6. li. 6. Num. xvi. 26. Is. li. 1—3, v. 3. 9—11, v. 11. Zech. ii. 6—9.)—He-goats. (8) Note, Prov. xxx. 29—31.

V. 11. 'Though the Chaldeans were the executors of God's judgments on the Jews; yet he punished them for what they did by his appointment: because they were carried on purely by their own ambition and covetousness, though Providence directed their cruelties and oppressions to the fulfilling its own ends and purposes. *Louth. V. 12, 13. Babylon was the mother-city, or metropolis, of the Chaldean empire. This was the greatest monarchy on earth at that time: (Notes, Dan. ii. 38. iv. 20—26. v. 18—24 :) yet the prophet called the Chaldeans “the hindermost of the nations,” either because of their wickedness, or in the prospect of the abject state to which they would be reduced; or perhaps as drinking last of the cup of vengeance, which he had been directed to send to the nations: (Note, xxv. 26.) The words may mean, “She shall be the hindermost of the nations, a wilderness, &c.” Isaiah predicted, that “Babylon should be pools of water;” (Note, Is. xiv. 21—23;) yet here it is foretold, that she should be “a dry land and a desert.” At first, the overflowing of the Euphrates reduced the adjacent country to a fen or marsh: but there is some ground to think, that in process of ages, and by the changes thus gradually produced, Jeremiah’s prediction also was literally fulfilled; as well as in the entire desolations of the city. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, li. 61—64. Is. xliii. 19—22. xxxiv. 9—15. Hab. ii. 4—18. Zeph. ii. 13—15. Rev. xviii. 21—24.)

V. 14. Sinned.] “She hath been, in a remarkable manner, an enemy to God’s truth and people. This may be especially applied to the mystical Babylon.” Lowth.—Though the Lord called the Babylonians his servants, and their work his work; yet because they did it not to glorify God, but for their own malice, and to profit themselves, it is here called sin.” (Notes, 1. 7, 8. 11.)

V. 20. The Jews never relapsed, after the captivity, into those idolatries, which had before been their great national offence, and had exposed them to these extreme sufferings. This and their other national sins were repent of, pardoned, and blotted out; so that they could no more be found.—But the words can be applied in their full meaning to none but true believers, the spiritual Israel, all the sins of whom are “buried in the depth of the sea,” so that none can lay any thing to their charge, or find any unpardoned or unmortified sin in them.—The passage implies a prediction of the future conversion of Israel and Judah to Christ, and their full participation of all the blessings of his gospel.—“In all the judgments God brings signification. The time of visitation on the rebels is come.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS

V. 1—8

The longer God delays his judgments, the heavier they will fall on those, who “treasure up wrath against the day” of righteous retribution.—His servants must not hesitate to declare his threatenings to the most prosperous sinners, either from fear of their frown, hope of their favour, or even gratitude for their kindness.—The ruin of those, who have been the supporters of idolatry, superstition, infidelity, or impiety, is necessary in order to the revival of true religion, and the more general propagation of Christ-ianity: and the prophecies of scripture may yield great comfort to the believer, in this view of them. It should not be concealed, but published to all the nations, that the great seat of anti-christian tyranny, idolatry, and superstition, and the grand persecutor of true Christians, is as certainly doomed to destruction as ancient Babylon was, and that all her idols will be broken, and her abomination buried in her ruins: for the Lord will cause his standard to be set up, and the instruments of his anger will be gathered together, to render “her land desolate, that none may dwell therein.” (Note, Rev. xviii. 21—24.) Then will immense multitudes learn to mourn for sin, and “to see the LORD, and join themselves to him” according to his new and everlasting covenant: then will “the lost sheep of the house of Israel” be brought back into the fold of the good Shepherd, and stray no more. In the meantime let us rejoice, that there is a remnant in every age who seek him with weeping and supplication; especially if conscious that we are of the number.—They, who would find acceptance with him, must come to his mercy-seat through the heavenly Advocate. If not acquainted with this “new and living Way” to Zion, they should enquire after it, by reading the word of God and praying for his Spirit; they should also attend the instructions and see the counsel of pious ministers, and cultivate the acquaintance of experienced Christians: above all, they should “show their faces thitherward,” and walk in the ways of God as far as they have learned them: for it is absurd and impious to pretend to enquire the way to heaven, whilst we continue in that course of life, which they are conscious leads to hell. (Notes, Is. xxxv. 8—10. John vii. 14—17. Acts x. 1, 2.)—Those, who have acquired some knowledge of the way, should be always ready to give instructions to enquirers. Nor ought we willingly to travel the road done: nay, we should use every kind of argument, persuasion, and expostulation, in calling on others to attend us; and desire that both we and they may be joined to the Lord, in the most intimate union, as his redeemed servants and worshippers. If we be reconciled to him, according to the tenour of his new covenant, by faith in Christ, the blessings will be perpetually, yea, eternally secured to us: our God will never forget his own engagements; and we should continually beseech him not to leave us to forget the duties of our relation to him. Then we shall no more be as “lost sheep, who have forgotten our resting-place,” and are exposed to the great devourer of souls; but we shall find rest and safety in God, “the Habitation of justice,” and the Hope of all the generations of Israel. Nor will he leave us to those wretched shepherds, who cause their flocks to go astray by false doctrine and corrupt examples; or who suffer them to wander in ignorance and error, through sloth and negligence: but he will himself “feed us with knowledge and understanding.”—The sins of professed Christians do not excuse the enmity, injustice, and cruelty of those, who rejoice in destroying the heritage of God. He, who will not save his people in their sins, will never countenance the wickedness of his open enemies, who upbraid them with their crimes, and then commit still viler abominations.—We should avail ourselves of opportunities given of separating more entirely from ungodly persons, and idolatrous and corrupt professors of the gospel. Every one should be prompt in taking the lead, and setting the example, in such pious singularity; and they especially, whose office or rank gives them pre-eminence, should be “the he-goats before the flocks,” in every pious and zealous endeavour to do good. (Notes, Tit. iii. 8. 12—15.)

V. 9—46.

How earnest ought we to be in choosing and securing that good part, which can never be taken from us! For worldly possessions often render men a more desirable and satisfying spoil to the sons of rapine and violence: and those who were chief soon become “the hindmost,” because of the wrath of the Lord. When he arises to render to sinners according to what they have done, accumulated miseries come upon them from every quarter; and every comfort and helper fails and vanishes. Indeed the people of God seem to fall a defenceless prey to their foes; and one king or nation after another scatters them, as the lion does the helpless sheep: thus they devour and torment them; they break their bones on racks, burn them in fires, immure them in dungeons, or reduce them to cruel bondage, and refuse to let them go. But persecutors of every age and nation may read their certain doom, in what befell the Assyrians and Chaldeans of old: for “the Redeemer of Israel is strong, the LORD of Hosts is his name, and he will thoroughly plead their cause,” and give them rest, and feed them in his green pastures, and satisfy them with his abundant consolations. (Note, Ps. xxiii. 1—3.) He will “pardon those whom he reserves,” and for ever bury their sins in oblivion, and be propitious to his chosen remnant.—But his enemies, after having, perhaps, been employed as his hammer to dash in pieces their fellow criminals, will themselves be broken in pieces: they will be taken in a snare, when they least suspect it; their treasures will be robbed, and they led away as fatted bullocks for the slaughter: for it is the work of God, against whom they have dared to contend. The vengeance of his broken law is terrible and that of his despised or abused gospel still more so: but the vengeance of his temple, the punishment of those, who have used all their power to put down his worship and extirpate his people, is most tremendous; (Note, Matt. xxi. 40—44;) and it will be far “more tolerable for Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment, than for them.”—From the judgments denounced against prosperous Babylon, and the mercies promised to afflicted Israel, we should learn to “choose affliction with the people of God,” rather than “the pleasures of sin for a season.” (Note, Heb. xi. 24—26.) And in the exact accomplishment, which has taken place of these ancient predictions; we may be encouraged to expect, with realizing faith, the performance of all the promises and prophecies of the sacred scriptures: for “heaven and earth shall pass away, but the words of our Lord shall not pass away.” (Note, Matt. xxiv. 32—35.)

V. 5. "For Israel hath been no widow, &c." Old Version.—Though Israel and Judah had been sharply corrected for the iniquities, with which they had filled the land; their enemies should find, that they were not left as a friendless widow, to be oppressed with impunity. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Is. xlvii. 7—10. liv. 4—10.)

V. 6. The Jews were ordered to leave Babylon, when permission was given them, (Note, Ezra i. 1—4,) as Lot left Sodom, lest they should be involved in her calamities, or corrupted by her idolatries. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 50—53. l. 7, 8. Gen. xix. 12—29. Zech. ii. 6—9. Rev. xiv. 9—11. xviii. 4—8.)

V. 7. The great splendour and prosperity of Babylon are denoted by the term golden: as the extensive desolations, occasioned by the victorious arms of Nebuchadnezzar, and the idolatries, which he propagated, are represented by a cup in the hand of God, to intoxicate the nations and make them mad. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xxv. 15—17. Dan. ii. 38. Hab. ii. 5—8. 15—17.) 'Babylon' has recommended her idolatries to the world by several 'specious pretences, as well as by her authority and example: so that they have been like poison set off by a 'golden cup, which hath enticed men to drink without 'being aware of the danger; and all this by God's permission, in order to the accomplishing some great ends 'of his providence. ...The sense of this verse is applied 'by St. John to spiritual Babylon, which has used the 'most plausible methods to disguise her idolatrous practices.' Lowth. (Notes, Rev. xiv. 8. xvii. 1—5. xviii. 1—3.)

V. 8. Marg. Ref.—Notes, l. 24. Is. xlvii. 7—15.—Take, &c.] 'This is spoken ironically, implying that her

'ruin is irrecoverable.' Lowth. (Notes, viii. 21, 22. xlv. 11.)

V. 9. The allies of Babylon did what they could to prevent her ruin; but finding it in vain, they determined to shift for themselves: for they saw the hand of God lifted up against her; who determined that her judgment should be made manifest to all men, as those objects are most conspicuous which reach very high. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xlv. 16, 17. l. 16.)

V. 10. By the vengeance of God on Babylon, it was manifested, that the Jewish nation had been unjustly oppressed by the Chaldeans; and that theirs was indeed the true religion, and their cause righteous as far as man was concerned. (Note, 5.) 'Therefore we ought to give glory 'to him, in the assemblies of his church, and in the most 'publick manner imaginable.' Lowth. (Notes, xxxi. 6—9. l. 28. Ps. xxxvii. 5—8, v. 6. Is. xlvii. 6. Mic. vii. 8—10. Rev. xix. 1—6.)

V. 11. (Marg. Ref.) 'Neriglissorus, king of Babylon' having formed an alliance against the Medes, Cambyses sent his son Cyrus, with an army of thirty thousand Persians, to join the Medes commanded by Cyaxares. ... Cyaxares, king of Media, called Darius the Mede in scripture, was Cyrus's uncle; and it was properly his army, that made the expedition against the Babylonians 'he employing Cyrus as his general. ...Persia...was of little account, till Cyrus made a figure in the world' Lowth. x. 5, 6. xiii. 2—5. liv. 15—17.) Some understand these verses of Cyrus, whom God would employ to execute his dreadful sentence upon Babylon and the Chaldeans: but others suppose, that Babylon, or the king of Babylon, is spoken of, as “the battle-axe,” by whom God would break in pieces the nations: and that after he had thus accomplished his purposes, God would execute vengeance on Babylon and the Chaldeans, for all the evil done in Zion; as well as for all their idolatries and iniquities. (Notes, xxv. 9—26. xxvii. 4—9.)—‘Or else the words ‘may be understood of the church, and imply, that God ‘will destroy all those powers and kingdoms, which are ‘adversaries to his truth and people. ...This will be fulfilled at the fall of mystical Babylon, when God’s kingdom shall “break in pieces all the kingdoms of the earth,” ‘in the destruction of that remnant of the fourth monarchy.’ Lowth. V. 25. Babylon stood in a plain: but the immense multitude of its buildings, and the height of the temples, walls, and towers, rendered the city as an artificial mountain. The destruction, which was thence diffused to all the surrounding nations, rendered Babylon as a tremendous volcano: but at length the empire and city would be consumed, as it were, by fire; and the Lord would overturn and roll them down, as a burnt mountain, into the ocean, to be found no more. (Notes, Rev. viii. 8, 9. xviii. 4—8.) —Destroying, &c.] ‘Or, “O corrupting mountain, which “corruptest the whole earth.” Babylon... was the seat of idolatry, from whence it was derived into other countries; ... which is remarkably true of mystical Babylon. (Rev. xvii. 5.) ... We do not find that Babylon was ever destroyed by fire: but that mystical Babylon shall be so destroyed is plain from Rev. xvii. 16. xviii. 8, 9.’ Lowth.

V. 26. ‘There shall not be left an entire stone fit to use. 1. 40.’ Lowth.—It is a figurative description of the most complete desolation; of being “swept with the besom of destruction,” as Isaiah has expressed it. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Note, Is. xiv. 21—23.)

V. 27. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Gen. viii. 4, 5. x. 1—5.) ‘The two former’ (Ararat and Minni) ‘are probably the same with the greater and lesser Armenia. Cyrus’s first expedition, in this war, was for reducing the Armenians who had revolted from the government of the Medes, who upon this conquest were obliged to send their usual quota of auxiliaries, to the carrying on the war against the Babylonians. ... By Ashchenaz Bochart understands Phrygia and Troas, ... part of that country being called Ascania by Homer. ... Cyrus had conquered Cræsus, and subdued several nations from the Egean sea to the Euphrates, before he marched against Babylon. ... Xenophon informs us, that there were both Phrygians and Cappadocians in Cyrus’s army.’ Lowth.—Virgil calls the son of Æneas the Trojan, Ascanius.—As the, &c.] That is, in immense multitudes destroying all before them. (Marg. Ref. q.)

V. 28. Marg. Ref.—Notes, 11. 1. 14—16. 41, 42.—Kings.] The princes or viceroys of the Median empire, or the kings that were allies and tributaries of the king of Media.—Long after this prophecy was delivered, Media was far more renowned than Persia: though at length the Median dominion was swallowed up, as it were, in the mighty empire of Persia.

V. 29. Marg. Ref.—Notes, 12. 26. 43. 61—64. 1. 39—45. Is. xiii. 17—22. xiv. 16—26. Rev. xviii. 21—24.

V. 30. ‘Accordingly the Babylonians, after the loss of a battle or two, never recovered their courage to face the enemy in the field again: they retired within their walls; and the first time that Cyrus came with his army before the place, he could not provoke them to venture forth, and try the fortune of arms: ... and the last time that he came, he consulted with his officers about the best manner of carrying on the siege, since, saith he, they do not come forth and fight.’ Bp. Newton.—The Chaldeans were very valiant, when the Lord used them as his hammer, or battle-axe; but they became as women, when his vengeance was to be executed on them. (Marg. Ref.—Note, Dan. v. 1—4.)—Bars, &c.] Marg. Ref.—Note, Is. xlv. 1—6.

V. 31, 32. (Marg. Ref.) Cyrus, having spent two years before Babylon, with little prospect of success, and being even derided by the inhabitants; at length drained the river, divided his army into two parts, and marched them into the city at each end, by the channel of it; and through the brazen gates, at the ends of each street toward the river, which the riotous Babylonians had left open. (Note, Dan. v. 1—4. 30, 31.)—When the Persians appeared in the city, messengers would immediately be sent to inform the king, “that the city was taken at one end,” not supposing that the other end was taken also: and these would meet with one another, and increase the terror and confusion of the inhabitants: but it seems, that the troops of Cyrus arrived at the palace, before the messengers could inform the king of his danger. They were also employed to carry information, that the Persians had stopped the passages, and cut off the communication between one part of the city and another: that they had set the reeds on 33 For thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; The daughter of Babylon ^b is like a threshing-floor, ^a it is time to thresh her: yet a little while, and ^c the time of her harvest shall come.

34 Nebuchadrezzar ^a the king of Babylon hath devoured me, he hath crushed me, ^c he hath made me an empty vessel, he hath ^f swallowed me up like a dragon, he hath filled his belly with my delicates, he hath cast me out.

35 ^g The violence done to me and to my ^h flesh be upon Babylon, shall the inhabitant of Zion say; and my blood upon the inhabitants of Chaldea, shall Jerusalem say.

36 Therefore thus saith the LORD; Behold, ^h I will plead thy cause, and ⁱ take vengeance for thee; ^k and I will dry up her sea, and make her springs dry.

38 They shall ⁿ roar together like lions: they shall ^o yell as lions' whelps.

39 In ^p their heat I will make their feasts, and I will make them drunken, that they may rejoice, ^q and sleep a perpetual sleep, and not wake, saith the LORD.

40 I will bring them down ^r like lambs to the slaughter, like rams with he-goats.

41 How is ^s Sheshach taken! and how is ^t the praise of the whole earth surprised! how is Babylon become ^u an astonishment among the nations!

42 The ^v sea is come up upon Baby-fire; and that the soldiers were so affrighted, as to be incapable of making any resistance.—‘The word...translated reeds properly signifies marshes or lakes. ... The enemies have burnt up all the outworks, belonging to the marshy grounds about the river. ... Herodotus takes notice, that the extreme parts of the city were taken, before they who dwelt in the middle of it were sensible of the danger.’

Lowth.

V. 33. Babylon had crushed and trampled on the nations, and especially on the Jews, as the corn was trodden out on the threshing floor: and she was about to endure like miseries herself. (Notes, Is. xxi. 10. Am. i. 3—5. Mic. iv. 11—13. Rev. xiv. 14—20.)—The riches of the nations, likewise, had been collected into her, as the sheaves into the floor: but her crimes had made her ripe for divine vengeance; the time of her harvest was at hand; the whole would be carried away by her enemies, as the field cleared at harvest, and the conquerors would be enriched by her spoils.—It is very common, in those countries, to thresh the corn on a floor placed in the field, soon after it is reaped: so that the time of harvest and that of threshing are nearly the same.

V. 34—37. Zion here complains to the Lord of the injuries, which she had sustained from the Chaldeans. They had devoured the substance, and destroyed the people, of Judah; they had rendered Jerusalem like “an empty vessel:” and, having gorged themselves, like voracious animals, with all her precious stores, they cast her and her children out of the land of promise, and carried them into captivity. (Marg. Ref. d—g.—Notes, l. 17, 18, 22, 23, 28. Kings xxv. 1—10. Is. xlvii. 6. Rev. vi. 9—11. xviii. 4—xix. 1—6.)—But this violence done to the children of Zion, and their blood which had been shed, lay upon Babylon as a heavy load; and in avenging Zion, God would waste Babylon, and render it the residence of venomous and hateful creatures alone. (Is. xxxiv. 9—15. Rev. xviii. 21

—24.) By drying up the sea and springs of Babylon, the destruction of her people, and the total failure of all those resources, whence she derived her immense riches, may be meant: and perhaps the draining off the waters of the Euphrates may be alluded to; as all great waters are called seas in scripture. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, l. 38—40. Rev. xvi. 12—16.)

Swallowed me, &c. (34) The animals, which some large serpents swallow whole and alive, may be alluded to.—Heaps, &c. (37) Notes, 25, 26. Is. xiii. 19—22.

V. 38—40. The noisy and boasting revels of the Chaldeans would be turned into howlings, when they found their enemies in the midst of them. The Lord so ordered it, that they should be left at this crisis to inflame themselves with wine, at a feast observed in honour of their idols; that their clamorous rejoicing and intoxication might make way for Cyrus to destroy them when fallen asleep, and they should wake no more in this world. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Is. xxi. 3—5. Dan. v. 1—9. 30, 31. Nah. i. 9, 10.) For thus God made them sacrifices to his awful justice; while they were exposed to the swords of their enemies, with as little consciousness of the doom which awaited them, as the animals had which were butchered or sacrificed. (Notes, l. 27. Rev. xviii. 9, 10, 20.)

V. 41. (Marg. Ref.) ‘Babylon was esteemed the wonder of the world, for the height, breadth, and compass of her walls, and the palace and hanging gardens belonging to it; for the temple of Belus; for the banks and facing of the river; and the artificial lakes and canals made for the draining of it.’ Lowth. (Notes, 52, 53. Dan. iv. 28—33.)—Some think that Sheshach was an idol worshipped at Babylon, from which the city derived this name. (Note, xxv. 26.)

V. 44. Bel was the chief idol of Babylon, and the destruction of his temple and worshippers was as his punishment; and doubtless it was a heavy punishment to those ambitious spirits, whom all idolaters worship. The immense treasures of his temple, which had been accumulating for ages, became the property of the conquerors. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 34—37. 1. 2, 3. Is. xlv. 1—6. xlv. 1, 2.)—‘The heathens ascribed the honour of all their successes to their idols; and upon any great victory, offered the best part of the spoils to their gods, and deposited them in their temples, as a grateful acknowledgement that the success was owing to their assistance. ...The restoring of the holy vessels to their right owner ... is here particularly foretold, which was done by Cyrus, upon his proclamation for rebuilding the temple. (Ezra i. 7.) ... The accomplishment of this prophecy, Dr. Prideaux places in Xerxes’s demolishing the temple of Belus, and plundering it of its vast wealth, which from Diodorus Siculus’s account of it, he computes to amount to twenty-one millions of our money. ... There shall be no more costly presents brought by foreign nations to the temple of Bel. ... Just as, under the Roman empire, people that were conquered by them, sent golden crowns to Jupiter Capitolinus.’ Lowth.—Yea, the wall, &c.] The idols and the lofty strong wall of Babylon, were combined as the confidence of the inhabitants: but they should both fall together. V. 46. (Marg. Ref.) Lest the invasion of the land, and the taking of the city where they resided, should terrify the Jews, the Lord intended to prepare them for it. Rumours would reach them, one year after another, of Cyrus’s intended expedition: and by comparing the wars, insurrections, and revolts, which took place, with these predictions, they might learn to consider such events as the forerunners of their own deliverance. (Notes, Matt. xxiv. 6—8. Luke xxi. 20—28.)—‘Meaning that Babylon should not be destroyed all at once; but by little and little should be brought to nothing. For the first year came the tidings, the next year the siege, and in the third year it was taken: yet this is not that horrible destruction, which the prophets threatened in many places; for that was after this, when they rebelled, and Darius overcame them by the policy of Zopyrus, and hanged three thousand gentlemen, besides the common people.’ (Note, 61—64.)

V. 47. (Notes, 44. 1. 2, 3. Is. xxi. 6—9.) ‘Taking this prophecy in its full extent, it comprises the fall of mystical Babylon, which is represented here, and in the parallel places of Isaiah and the Revelation, as a decisive stroke, which should thoroughly vindicate the cause of oppressed truth and innocence, and put a final period to idolatry, and to all the oppressions of God’s people.’ Lowth. (Notes, Rev. xvii. xviii.) St. John introduces all the friends and servants of God, exulting in the fall of the New Testament Babylon. To which they answered, that they were covered with shame, because of the reproach under which they lay, whilst their holy places had been profaned, destroyed, and trampled on by strangers. V. 52, 53. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 44. 47.) The builders of Babel, (or Babylon,) meant to “build a tower, whose top should reach unto heaven:” (Note, Gen. xi. 1—4 :) and the walls of Babylon were of prodigious and almost incredible height and strength. It appears from the testimony of some who had been upon the spot, that the walls were three hundred and fifty feet in height, and eighty seven in thickness, and sixty miles in circuit; with towers still higher and stronger at proper distances: and, though there is some difference in the account given by different authors; yet all agree that the fortifications of Babylon were unparalleled. Depending on these, and the plenty of provisions that were in the city, the inhabitants derided the besiegers. But God had sent them, and they were sure to prevail. Notes, 30—32.)

V. 54, 55. (Marg. Ref.) The multitude, tumult, and castings of the inhabitants of Babylon, made a noise like the waves of the sea: but in process of time it would be succeeded by entire solitude and silence; except as interrupted by the noise of doleful birds and venomous creatures. (Notes, 61—64. Is. xlii. 19—22. xiv. 9—11. xlvii. 5. 7—10. Rev. xviii. 21—24.)

V. 58. The labour and expense, beyond all computation, which had been employed by men of several nations and peoples, in erecting the stupendous walls and towers of Babylon, and forming the massy brazen gates, and in endeavouring to defend them; in which numbers had laboured as in the fire, and been wearied even unto death, would in the event be found entirely vain, useless, and ruinous. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.) Modern travellers concur in testifying, that no vestiges remain of all these immense buildings and fortifications. (Notes, 44. 47. 52, 53. Dan. iv. 28—33. Hab. ii. 12—14.)

V. 59. With, &c.] Or, “on the behalf of Zedekiah.” Marg. It does not appear that Zedekiah went to Babylon at this time.—Quiet.] Some interpret this word, of Seraiah's office under Zedekiah, or of his carrying a present to Nebuchadnezzar: (marg.) but perhaps it refers to his character as a peaceable and pious man; who, (though employed by Zedekiah on an embassy to Babylon,) was ready to perform this service put upon him by the prophet.—Seraiah was brother to Baruch. (xxxii. 12. xxxvi. 4. xlv. 2.)

V. 60. Marg. Ref.—Notes, xxxvi. 1—4. 27—32.

61 And Jeremiah said to Seraiah, "When thou comest to Babylon, " and shalt see, and shalt ° read all these words ;

62 Then shalt thou say, O LORD, thou hast spoken against this place, to cut it off, that none shall remain in it, neither man nor beast, but that it shall be * desolate for ever.

63 And it shall be, when thou hast made an end of reading this book, that thou shalt bind a stone to it, and cast it into the midst of Euphrates :

64 And thou shalt say, ' Thus shall Babylon sink, and shall not arise from the evil that I will bring upon her : and ° they shall be weary. ' Thus far are the words of Jeremiah.

V. 61—64. When Seraiah was come to Babylon, and had surveyed the strength, magnificence, prosperity, luxury, pride, and wickedness of that flourishing city ; he was ordered to read, (probably before some principal persons among the captive Jews,) all the words of this prophecy, concerning its entire and final ruin and desolation : and then, to give the greater solemnity to the transaction, and to shew his belief of what he had read, he was directed to make an address to JEHOVAH, the God of Israel, concerning the import of the transaction, and to sink the book in the Euphrates, declaring that thus Babylon would fall, and rise no more ; for its inhabitants would be like men fainting with weariness, who can no longer resist their assailants. Babylon was in the full height of her prosperity, when this declaration was made : and these predictions could scarcely escape the notice, either of the Jews or the Chaldeans at that time ; though the event rendered them far more generally regarded. (Notes, Rev. xiv. 8. xviii. 21—24.)

Shall not arise, &c. (64) Intimations of mercy in reserve for Israel and Judah, and even for other nations, "in the latter days," are joined to the most awful denunciations of avenging judgments : but the contrary is expressly predicted concerning Babylon. She "shall arise no more."—Thus far.] The next chapter seems to have been added by Ezra, or some other person, to illustrate the predictions of Jeremiah which are here terminated, and the Lamentations which follow. (Note, 46.)—It may be proper, very briefly to state a few particulars, concerning the gradual fulfilment of this extraordinary prophecy.—'Notwithstanding these precautions,' (those used by Cyrus, to prevent a revolt of the Babylonians,) 'they rebelled against Darius ; and in order to hold out to the last extremity, they took all their women, and each man choosing one of them, out of his own family, ... they strangled the rest,' (with their children also,) 'that unnecessary mouths might not consume their provisions. ... They sustained the siege for twenty months. ... As soon as Darius had made himself master of the place, he ordered three thousand of the principal men to be crucified, and thereby fulfilled the prophecies of the cruelty, which the Medes and Persians should use towards the Babylonians.' Bp. Newton. B. c. 516.—'After this, 1. Babylon ceased to be a royal city, the kings of Persia choosing to reside elsewhere. They delighted more in Shushan, Ecbatana, Persepolis, &c. and did themselves destroy a good part of Babylon. 2. We are informed by Strabo and Pliny, that the Macedonians, who succeeded the Persians, ... built Selucia in the neighbourhood, on purpose to draw away its inhabitants, and to have it deserted. Nothing can better explain what the prophet had foretold, "It shall not be inhabited." Its own masters endeavour to depopulate it. 3. The new kings of Persia, who afterwards became masters of Babylon, completed the ruin of it by building Ctesiphon, which carried away all the ... inhabitants she had left : so that from the time the anathema was pronounced against that city ; it seems as if those very persons, who ought to have protected her, were become her enemies ; as if they had all thought it their duty to reduce her to a state of solitude, though by indirect means without using any violence. ... 4. She was so totally forsaken, that nothing was left remaining but the walls, ... when Pausanias wrote his remarks on Greece, A. D. 96. ... 5. The kings of Persia, finding the place deserted, made a park of it, in which they kept wild beasts for hunting. ... 6. At length the walls of Babylon fell down ... and were never repaired. ... The animals, which served for pleasure to the Persian kings, abandoned the place : serpents and scorpions remained. ... The Euphrates, ... having no longer a free channel, took its course another way. ... 7. By means of all these changes Babylon became an utter desert, ... so that the most able geographers at this day cannot determine where it stood.' Rollin's Ancient History. (Note, l. 12, 13.)—This prophecy, the latest of those delivered against Babylon, has been extant two thousand four hundred years ; and all historians, travellers, and geographers, (the persons in all the world, who are the most capable of knowing,) whether Jews, infidels, or Christians ; whether papists or protestants ; agree that the state of those regions at this day, exactly accords with it ! So certainly, also, shall the prophecies against the New Testament Babylon be accomplished.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—32.

When they who have prospered sink into trouble, those professed friends who were attached to their prosperity alone, often set themselves against them round about : (P. O. 2 Kings ix. 30—37.—Notes, 2 Kings x. 1—7. Esth. vii. 8, 9 :) but the Lord is a Friend who changes not, and is especially kind to his people in adversity.—Such as delight in war and blood, generally perish by others as bloodthirsty as themselves : but "blessed are the peace-makers, for they shall be called the children of God." (Note, Matt. v. 9.) He will punish his offending worshippers ; but that does not secure their oppressors : for though the land of Judah was "filled with sin against the holy One of Israel ;" yet the king and people of Babylon had no right to seize upon it and destroy its inhabitants. The Lord will therefore "bring forth the righteousness" of such as have been unjustly oppressed; and will plead the cause of his people against those, who slander, enslave, or spoil them: and if we have waited for him and are helped, we should come and declare in Zion his work in our behalf. (Notes, Ps. lxvi. 13—16. cxvi. 12—19.) When he devises evil against sinners, he will easily "raise up the spirits" of his chosen instruments, that he may effect it: and they, who would deliver their own souls, must separate without delay from among the workers of iniquity.—The splendid achievements of mighty conquerors, and the majesty of haughty monarchs and oppressive empires, only render them a golden cup in the hand of God, to make the nations mad and miserable: and too often idolatry and iniquity have spread, in proportion to the enlargement of flourishing monarchies. But these have their rise, progress, continuance, and decline: some of them gradually decay; others fall, and are destroyed suddenly and irreparably; and the just judgments of God are conspicuous to all beholders, in their ruin.—When riches and prosperity are depended on, and no end is put to men's desires of increasing their possessions; severe calamities may be expected to assign a measure to their insatiable covetousness, and to tear from them their idolized treasures.—What idol, or created arm, can withstand the Creator and Upholder of the world; who is also the Portion of his people? He is able to save and to destroy; and whatever use he makes of ungodly men, he will execute vengeance on them at last: but those who trust, love, and serve him, shall be graciously protected and abundantly recompensed.

Whilst God avenges all injustice and oppression; the violence done to "the saints and martyrs of Jesus" will draw down the heaviest load of vengeance: and in bringing sinners to condign punishment, he needs only to leave them to their lusts, and they will make way for their own destruction.—Drunken revels and sensual mirth are awful preparations for death: and if men would not fall asleep amidst such excesses, to awake no more but in eternal ruin, they ought not to indulge in them. (Notes, 1 Sam. xxv. 36—38. 2 Sam. xiii. 22—29.)—The wars and desolations, which pervade the earth, should cause our hearts to mourn; but not to faint or fear: for though "violence be in the land, and ruler against ruler," and tremendous slaughter be made; yet the Lord presides, and is preparing to execute judgment on the enemies of his cause, that heaven and earth may sing his praise.—We may indeed, even at this day, complain of reproach and shame; because the sanctuaries of his house are possessed and profaned by those, who are strangers and enemies to his truth and grace: but let us still "remember the LORD our God," and pray for the promised, and not far distant, peace of Jerusalem: let us use every means which he has appointed, to promote the cause of genuine Christianity; and confidently expect, that Babylon and every Antichrist will soon sink, to rise no more for ever. We need not be dismayed at the haughtiness, prosperity, or power of the wicked; or at the prospect of mountainous difficulties in our way: for there is "nothing too hard for the LORD." Let us therefore hope in his word, and quietly wait for his salvation: and then we shall see, but never share, the destruction of the wicked who rise up against us.

* Or, scribe of the captain of the host. * principal scribe of the host, who mustered the people of the land; and threescore men of the people of the land, that were found in the midst of the city.

26 So Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard took them, and brought them to the king of Babylon to Riblah.

27 And * the king of Babylon smote them, and put them to death ^y in Riblah, in the land of Hamath. ^z Thus Judah was carried away captive out of his own land.

28 ¶ This is the people whom Nebuchadrezzar carried away captive: ^a in the seventh year, three thousand Jews and three and twenty:

29 In ^b the eighteenth year of Nebuchadrezzar, he carried away captive from Jerusalem eight hundred thirty and two [†] persons.

30 In the three and twentieth year of Nebuchadrezzar, Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard ^c carried away captive of the Jews seven hundred forty and five persons: all the persons were four thousand and six hundred.

31 ¶ And ^d it came to pass in the seven and thirtieth year of the captivity of Jehoiachin king of Judah, in the twelfth month, in the five and twentieth day of the month, that Evilmerodach ^e king of Babylon, in the first year of his reign, ^f lifted up the head of Jehoiachin king of Judah, and brought him forth out of prison,

32 And spake ^g kindly to him, and ^h set his throne above the throne of the kings, that were with him in Babylon,

33 And ⁱ changed his prison-garments: and ^j he did continually eat bread before him all the days of his life.

34 And for his diet, ^k there was ^l continual diet given him of the king of Babylon, ^m every day a portion, until the day of his death, all the days of his life.

—‘These were eminent persons, who had concealed themselves, but were afterwards discovered.’ Lowth.

V. 28, 29. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Note, 2 Kings xxiv. 8—16.) ‘Archbishop Usher ... supposes, that this, and the two following verses, give an account of the lesser captivities, which the Jews suffered under Nebuchadnezzar: whereas there were three others, in which many more persons were carried away; viz. in the first year of his reign, (Dan. i. 3;) in the eighth year, (2 Kings xxiv. 12;) and in the nineteenth, when the city was destroyed.’ Lowth.

V. 30. This event is no where else mentioned: but it seems that a remnant continued, dispersed in different parts of the land, after Johanan retired into Egypt; and perhaps some escaped from Egypt and joined them: but Nebuzar-adan at length carried them away also. (Notes, liv. 1—14.)—Nebuchadnezzar, at this time, seems to have been occupied in the siege of Tyre. (Note, Ez. xxix. 7—20.)—On any supposition, the numbers mentioned, as carried captive, must appear exceedingly small, compared with the immense population of the land in preceding times: but it is probable, that vast numbers were removed into other countries, by one means or another; and the miseries and massacres of the Jews seem to have been very tremendous, previous to this catastrophe.

V. 31—34. Five and twentieth. (31) (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Note, 2 Kings xxv. 27—30.) ‘This advancement might be resolved upon the twenty-fifth day, but not brought to pass till the twenty-seventh.’ Lowth.—Evilmerodach.] This name seems to mean, ‘Foolish Mero-dach;’ alluding to his previous character. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

When nations provoke God to give them up to ruin, he leaves their princes to infatuated counsels, which bring deserved punishment on them and their subjects. Would we then have wise and successful rulers, we must pray for them, and study ourselves to walk conscientiously before God.—When sinners follow one another in the ways of rebellion; it may be expected, that God will follow them with similar judgments. Ringleaders in impiety will have the heavier load of misery: external privileges and sacredness of character aggravate the wickedness of transgressors, and will increase their punishment: and the ruin of churches and nations is often chargeable on the crimes of the leading ministers of religion.—But let us, with serious application to ourselves, observe, how certainly the word of God takes effect; and how fatal are the consequences of obstinate iniquity and impiety. Let us consider the manifold changes of this world; that we may mourn without desponding, even under long continued afflictions, as we know not what good may be reserved for us; and rejoice in prosperity without presuming, for we know not what fatal reverse may await us. And let us “set our affections on things above,” where there are no changes or death, because no more temptation or sin, for evermore. (Note, Rev. xxi. 1—4.)

THE LAMENTATIONS OF JEREMIAH.

‘THE Jews denominate this Book Echah, (How;) from the first word of the text; or sometimes they call it Kinnoth, (Tears;) alluding to the mournful character of the work. Josephus and other writers ... suppose that it was written on the occasion of Josiah’s death. The generality of commentators are, however, of a contrary opinion: and indeed Jeremiah here bewails the desolations of Jerusalem, the captivity of Judah, the miseries of famine, and the cessation of all publick worship, in terms so forcible and pathetick, that they appear rather applicable to some period after the destruction of Jerusalem, when, agreeably to his own predictions, every circumstance of complicated distress overshadowed Judea.’ Gray’s Key. (Note, 2 Chr. xxxv. 25—27.)—It is indeed wonderful, that any man, having attentively perused the book, should doubt concerning the occasion, on which it was written.—‘It came to pass, that after Israel was carried captive, and Jerusalem was desolated, Jeremiah sat weeping, and bewailed this wailing (ἐδυνήσατο τὸν θρήνον τοῦτον) over Jerusalem, and said, How, &c.’ Sept. The last clause of the fifty-first chapter of Jeremiah, “Thus far are the words of Jeremiah,” are omitted in the LXX, which are by many writers considered as introducing the Lamentations; and the words above cited are added. They shew, however, the view of these ancient translators as to the occasion of the book before us.—The prophet had said, that if the people “would not hear, his soul should weep in secret places for their pride:” (Note, Jer. xiii. 15—17 :) and though the awful catastrophe was a remarkable attestation of his character, as a true prophet, and confuted all his opposers; yet his lamentations over it, constitute beyond all comparison, the most tender and pathetick elegy, which is extant in any language.—‘This poem affords the most elegant variety of affecting images, that ever probably were collected into so small a compass. The scenes of affliction, the circumstances of distress, are painted with such beautiful combination; that we contemplate every where the most affecting picture of desolation and misery. The prophet reiterates his complaints in the most pathetick style; and aggravates his sorrow, with a boldness and force of description, that correspond with the magnitude and religious importance of the calamities displayed to view. In the instructive strains of an inspired writer, he reminds his countrymen of the grievous rebellions, which had provoked the Lord to “abhor his sanctuary;” confesses that “it was of God’s mercies, that they were not utterly consumed;” and points out the sources of evil in the iniquities of their false prophets and priests. He then with indignant irony threatens Edom with destruction, for rejoicing over the miseries of Judea; opens a consolatory prospect... to Zion; and concludes with an affecting address to God, to consider the reproach of his people, and to renew their prosperity.’ Gray’s Key.—‘Never was there a more rich and elegant variety of beautiful images and adjuncts arranged together within so small a compass, nor more elegantly chosen and applied.’ Bp. Lowth.—The primary design indeed of this sacred Poem seems to have been, to teach the captive Jews the due medium, between obdurate insensibility and rebellious despondency, under their calamities; to lead them to consider God as the righteous Author, and sin as the deserving cause, of their suffering; to call them to the exercise of submission, repentance, faith, and prayer; to shew them the way of finding support under every trial, and benefit from it; to inspire them with abhorrence of those crimes, which had involved them in such complicated miseries, and with hopes of promised deliverance, from the mercy of God.—This view of the subject will likewise occasionally lead us to look to Him, who for our salvation became “a Man of sorrows and acquainted with grief,” and who, in these things, and in all others, has left us a perfect “example that we should follow his steps.” (Notes, i. 12—17. iii. 1.) The nature of the subject precludes the expectation of direct prophecies, as proofs of the divine inspiration of the poem; except as it introduces and adopts the predictions of other scriptures, and anticipates the accomplishment of them. Neither is it expressly quoted in the New Testament; unless St. Paul intended to refer to it; (Comp. iii. 45. with 1 Cor. iv. 13;) but there never was a doubt so much as hinted by the Jews, against its being the genuine work of Jeremiah and a part of the sacred oracles: and the instructions conveyed in it remarkably coincide with those of the New Testament.—Each of the chapters consists of twenty-two stanzas; (for no doubt the work is poetical;) each verse in the two first begins with a letter of the Hebrew alphabet, in regular order; after the manner of some of the Psalms. The third has three short verses to each stanza; each beginning with the Hebrew letters as before; but with one variation as to the order of them. The fourth accords to the first and second: but the fifth, though consisting of the same number of verses, is not arranged according to the initial letters.—There are many traditions extant about the death of this prophet; but no great dependence can be placed on them.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1, 2. In these pathetick complaints, the prophet sometimes speaks in his own person: at other times Jerusalem, or Zion, as a sorrowing female, is the speaker: and at others a chorus, or collective body of the Jews, is introduced. The reader is also, in some places, made to witness the miseries of the people, during the siege of Jerusalem: then the calamities attending the plunder and destruction of it are presented to his imagination: then he reviews the dreary condition of the city and land, when the desolations were completed, and hears the insults of their enemies over them: or his attention is called to the poor captives at Babylon, as if indeed a spectator of the hardships put on them. Thus the scenes are shifted, so to speak, in such a manner, as may best realize to the mind the various and complicated miseries, endured by the nation, from the death of Josiah to the final desolation of Jerusalem and Judea, and the captivity of the people; but especially at the close of that period.—The scene, here laid, is the city, after all the inhabitants had been driven out of it, and its buildings burned; and while it lay in ruins. The prophet had witnessed Jerusalem a populous, prosperous, and tumultuous city: but now viewing her desolate situation, he exclaims, “How doth the city sit solitary, that was full of people!” Jerusalem, as a weeping female, sits on the ground, with none to attend or comfort her: the Lord had forsaken her, her king was carried captive, and she was become as a widow. (Notes, Is. iii. 18—26, v. 25, 26. liv. 4, 5.) She had been eminent in dignity and authority; and in the days of David and Solomon, several of the surrounding nations acknowledged her as their princess, and rendered her tribute: (Notes, 2 Sam.

4 The ways of Zion do mourn, because none come to the solemn feasts: ^p all her gates are desolate: ^q her priests sigh, her virgins are afflicted, and she is in bitterness.

5 Her ^r adversaries are the chief, her enemies prosper; for ^s the Lord hath afflicted her for the multitude of her transgressions: ^t her children are gone into captivity before the enemy.

6 And ^u from the daughter of Zion ^v all her beauty is departed: ^w her princes are become like ^x harts that find no pasture, and they are gone without strength before the pursuer.

7 Jerusalem ^y remembered, in the days of her affliction and of her miseries, ^z all her pleasant things that she had in the days of old, when her people fell into the hand of the enemy, and none did help her: ^a the adversaries saw her, and did mock at her sabbaths.

viii. 1—14. x. 8—18. 1 Kings iv. 21. 24:) but she was now become tributary, and was grievously oppressed by the heathen. How had this lamentable reverse in her condition taken place? Without doubt the hand of God was gone forth against her; or her enemies could never have thus prevailed. On these accounts, Jerusalem is represented as “weeping very sore,” even in the night when others are refreshed by sleep; a continued flow of tears bedewed her cheeks; none of her idols, who had seduced her from God, and had been her paramours in spiritual adultery, could now afford her any consolation; and her heathen allies, whom she had depended on as her friends, were treacherously turned to be her enemies. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Jer. iv. 30, 31. xxx. 12—18. Ez. xvi. 35—43. xxiii. 11—25. Hos. ii. 6, 7.)

V. 3. Here the scene changes, and Judah is considered, as a female dragged away to Babylon, a captive and a slave, by reason of those grievous afflictions which sin had occasioned. There she dwelt “in great servitude,” among idolaters, at a distance from the ordinances of God, bereft of all her comforts, and exposed to every outrage from the insulting victors, who hated her for her relation to JEHOVAH: nor could she there have any rest from labour, terror, and suffering. Her persecutors, who had long pursued her, at length had overtaken her in the straits, where she could not elude or avoid them: and she was entirely exposed to their merciless oppression. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Jer. lii. 6—11. Notes, iv. 18, 19. 2 Kings xxv. 1—10. Jer. xvi. 16. Am. ix. 1—4.)

V. 4—7. The poor disconsolate captive is for the present lost sight of; and the reader is presented with a view of the city after it was taken. The ways, that led to Zion, had used at stated times to be thronged by persons, who,

8 Jerusalem ^a hath grievously sinned; therefore she is ^e removed: ^e all that honoured her despise her, because they have seen her nakedness: yea, she sigheth, and turneth backward.

9 Her ^b filthiness is in her skirts; she remembereth not her last end; therefore she ^k came down wonderfully: ^l she had no comforter. O LORD, behold my affliction; ^m for the enemy hath magnified himself.

10 The adversary hath ^o spread out his hand upon all her ^p pleasant things: for she hath ^p seen that the heathen entered into her sanctuary, ^q whom thou didst command that they should not enter into thy congregation.

11 All her people sigh; ^r they seek bread; they have given their pleasant things for meat to ^r relieve the soul: ^s see, O LORD, and consider; for I am become vile.

12 ¶ ^t Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by? behold, and see, ^t if there be

from all parts of the land, came up to keep the solemn feasts: but now the enemies were in possession of the city; the inhabitants were slain, emigrated, or carried captive, and the ways were unfrequented. The gates, through which multitudes had used to pass and repass continually, were silent and desolate. The priests, deprived of employment and subsistence, spent their time in unavailing sighs: and the virgins, who formerly attended the sacred temple-service, were in the deepest distress. (Marg. Ref. o—q.—Note, iv. 11—16.) Zion herself, or Jerusalem (1), was in bitterness: her enemies had acquired the ascendancy, and prospered in all their attempts against her: the Lord, who had been her Protector, was provoked, by the multitude of her transgressions, to give her up into the hands of her adversaries; and her children were torn from her and carried captive. (Marg. Ref. r—t.—Note, Deut. xxviii. 43, 44.) Thus all her beauty and glory, both of external prosperity and of the temple and sacred services, were departed from her. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Ez. vii. 20—22. xxiv. 25—27.) Her princes, once courageous as lions, were now become, not only timorous as the hunted harts, or deer, which dare not face the pursuers; but feeble as the harts that find no pasture, and are not able to flee away. (Marg. Ref. u—z.—Note, Jer. xiv. 2—6, v. 5.) In these circumstances Jerusalem remembered, with bitter regret, her former prosperity and privileges, both civil and sacred; and this remembrance added to her anguish, now that her people were helplessly fallen into the hand of the enemy. (Note, Luke xvi. 24—26.) Her adversaries saw and insulted over her miseries: and as they had always derided her sacred solemnities, and observance of her sabbaths; they now mocked her, because these peculiarities had been apparently of no use to her. (Marg. Ref. a—c.)

Sabbaths. (7) The word (שַׁבָּת) thus translated occurs in no other place: the LXX render it, 'in her captivity.' But as it is derived from the same root with that always translated "sabbath;" probably our version conveys the true meaning. 'The heathen writers commonly ridicule the Jewish sabbaths, as a mark of their sloth and idleness; without considering the excellent use that day was designed for, viz. to give men leisure to attend on the service of God, and learn the duties of religion.' Lowth.

V. 8—11. The enemies of Jerusalem, witnessing her calamities, mocked at her religion as unprofitable: but the prophet reminded them, that her miseries were the punishment of her grievous transgressions, which rendered all her "forms of godliness" unacceptable. She was therefore removed, and as it were turned out of doors, for her offences. The nations, which had been used to honour her, now despised her; for her crimes by which she had disgraced herself, were as conspicuous as the punishments were, by which God had stripped her naked, and exposed her to shame: and this was the cause of her sighs, groans, and confusion of face. Indeed she had been so shameless in her filthiness, that she had taken no pains to conceal it, but exposed it to every one. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. d—h. Notes, Jer. ii. 33—37. xiii. 22. 27. Ez. xxiv. 12, 13.) She had not remembered, what Moses and the prophets had declared would be the last end of such misconduct; therefore she was brought down from her eminency in the most wonderful manner, and was reduced to the most abject and disconsolate misery. (Marg. Ref. i, k.—Notes, Deut. xxxii. 29. Is. xlvii. 7—10, v. 7. Jer. v. 30, 31.)—In this view of the state of Jerusalem, the prophet was extremely grieved to think, how the enemy magnified himself, and was emboldened in idolatry and blasphemy: and he therefore besought the Lord to behold and compassionate the affliction of his people. He was deeply affected to behold the adversaries of Jerusalem, not only seize on all her valuable treasures, jewels, and furniture; but spread their sacrilegious hands on the sacred vessels of the temple, which were most pleasant to every pious mind: for Jerusalem had seen the heathen, who by the law were excluded from the congregation of Israel, profaning by their presence and depredations, the sanctuary, and even the holy of holies! (Marg. Ref. i—q.—Notes, Deut. xxiii. 3—6. Neh. xiii. 1—3. Ps. lxxiv. 4—8. Ez. xxiv. 19—24.) At the same time the people sighed and lamented: for in the extremity of the famine, they not only had given all their valuable effects to purchase bread, to preserve their lives; but at length were forced by hunger to give up the temple, and all its pleasant things, into the hands of the idolatrous besiegers. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. r, s.—Notes, ii. 12. v. 1—10. 2 Kings xxv. 1—5.) In this most deplorable condition Jerusalem at length brake silence, and supplicated the compassion of God, seeing she was become so vile and despised, among the enemies of true religion.—Relieve the soul. (11) Or "Make the soul to come again." Marg.—Note, 1 Sam. xiv. 24—34, vv. 27—30.

in the close of the preceding verse,) sitting dejected and distressed upon the ground; and, seeing the passengers ready to neglect or insult her sufferings, she called upon them to consider whether her example did not concern them: or she demanded their attention to her most deplorable condition. Doubtless they ought attentively to consider the greatness of her miseries, that they might sympathize with her; and the cause of them, that they might take warning and receive instruction. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. t.) It must be evident to all beholders, that her sorrows were unprecedented, in greatness and variety: and that the Lord himself had done all this to her “in his fierce anger.” His wrath, like fire from heaven, penetrated, tortured, and consumed her bones, and enervated her strength. His various judgments, (like a net spread over her feet,) so entangled her that she could not escape: and if she attempted it, he still turned her back again into the power of her persecutors. Thus he had made her destitute and faint with unremitted miseries. She had been sold as a slave for her transgressions; and God himself had bound the yoke, and wreathed it on her neck, so that she could not possibly shake it off: her slavery was the evident effect and punishment of her crimes, and was embittered by the sense of his wrath: and he had deprived her of all power to withstand or escape the instruments of his righteous vengeance. These things extorted her ceaseless tears: for God, who alone could comfort her when thus bereaved of her children, was become her Enemy, and paid no regard to her supplications, when she spread forth her hands towards him. Nay, he had given commandment, that her adversaries should surround her; and that even idolaters should treat her with loathing or neglect. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. f. i. 1.)—Some parts of this passage are often quoted, in speaking of our Lord’s sufferings; and they are capable of a striking accommodation: but it should be recollected, that this is only accommodation, and not the real meaning of the sacred writer.—The address is so exquisitely pathetic, that no comment can possibly do justice to it.—The LORD hath commanded, &c. V. 18—22. In the midst of all her sufferings, Jerusalem was constrained to acknowledge the justice of God, and to condemn herself; for she “had rebelled against his commandment.” It therefore peculiarly demanded the attention of all people, to observe the punishment to which her crimes had subjected her.—All confidences failed in the extremity of her trouble: (Note, 1, 2 :) even her priests and elders perished for famine; what then must have been the case with the multitude of her inhabitants;

But her inward anguish was most intolerable, through the sense of guilt and of the wrath of God ; whilst the sword devoured without, and the famine and pestilence within the city : for the scene seems here to be laid previous to the taking of Jerusalem. It was in vain to look to her former friends, for they had heard of her sorrows, but made no attempt to comfort her : and her enemies exulted and rejoiced over her miseries, out of hatred to her and her religion. She had therefore none to look to but God, and to him she made her appeal ; assured that the doom of her enemies was passed, and that the Lord would deal with them, as he had done with her because of her transgressions, which had reduced her to so deplorable a condition. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS

We shall often be required, in this evil world, “to weep with those that weep,” and we should not be reluctant to so salutary an employment. (Notes, Rom. xii. 14—16, v. 15. 1 Cor. xii. 15—26, v. 26. P. O. 12—26.)—We now hear the denunciations of the wrath of God against the workers of iniquity ; and we shall soon be spectators of the accomplishment : nay, here the serious mind perceives abundant cause to meditate, with solemn awe and deep concern, on the tokens of his indignation at the sins of men.—The history of nations, churches, families, and individuals, abounds with fulfilments of the scriptures. How is it that so many populous cities now “sit solitary ?” that so many flourishing empires are now become tributary and enslaved ? Whence are the tears, with which great multitudes wear away their restless nights and joyless days ; while they mourn the loss of dear relatives, the treachery of professed friends, the cruelty of enemies, the oppression of the powerful, the fury of persecutors, grievous servitude, and multiplied afflictions ? Whence is it, that idolaters now occupy the places, where flourishing churches once stood ? that the ways of Zion are deserted, her ordinances interrupted or profaned ; her gates desolated ; her priests and people in bitterness, or cut off ? How is it that the adversaries of the church are the chief, and prosper, and that her children are in captivity ? (Notes, Deut. xxviii. 3—14. 43, 44.) However we may vary our enquiries, the same answer recurs : “The fierce anger of the “LORD,” for man’s transgressions, has filled the earth with sighs and groans ; with tears, and sickness, and death. Sin has slain all the former generations of men ; has murdered our ancestors, relatives, friends, or children ; has aimed many a mortal blow at us, and will certainly effect our death also. Sin has prepared the place of torment, and filled it with fallen spirits ; and with the souls of those, who have died unpardoned and unchanged. Sin would as certainly have conveyed all our souls to this place of misery, as all our bodies to the grave : if “the Lamb of “God” had not come to take away the guilt and power of it, from those who believe in him. Sin has tarnished all the beauty and marred all the glory of our rational nature. Sin fills our consciences with remorse, and our hearts with terror ; deprives the soul of strength and confidence ; perverts every pleasant thing and every good gift of God, and even his truths, sabbaths, and ordinances, into occasions of deeper condemnation and misery. Yet, after all, we are disposed to lodge this serpent in our bosom ; yea, to entertain it in our hearts, to expect our happiness from it, and to cleave to it as our most valuable treasure ! (P. O. 2 Kings x. 1—14.)—Among the manifold evil effects of sin, the pious mind is peculiarly grieved, when, being committed by professors of true religion, it “causes the enemies of God to blaspheme,” and to mock and scoff at the truths and ordinances of his word and worship. “Woe be to the world because of offences ! and woe be to those, “by whom such offences come !” except their repentance be as deep, as their transgressions are aggravated. We ought to prefer all other temporal effects of sin to this. Should any be wonderfully brought down from the height of affluence to the depth of penury ; should their honour be changed for contempt ; should they have no comforter in affliction, and be constrained to part with all their pleasant things for bread to sustain life ; nay, should they have the immediate prospect of dying by famine : all this ought to be considered as far less afflicting, than that their sins should cause the name, truths, and ordinances of God to be blasphemed ; and men to stumble, and fall, and perish for ever, through the increasing prejudice, hardness, and impiety which they have excited. (Note, Matt. xviii. 7—9. P. O. 7—14.) Even the profanation of sacred things, and the sacrilege of those, who in different ages have laid their rapacious hands on the substance, which was dedicated to the support of religion ; and the contempt, with which the clerical office has been treated by profligates and infidels, have in great measure been chargeable upon the atrocious sins of professed Christians and preachers of the gospel who have rendered themselves vile, and exposed themselves to shame by their evident misconduct ; and therefore the Lord has made them vile and contemptible, even to the most abandoned of mankind. (Note, Mal. ii. 4—9.)

V. 12—22.

We cannot derive benefit from our sufferings, unless we look above instruments and occasions, and consider the hand of God in them. He it is, who impoverishes, enfeebles, intimidates, and enslaves men, as he sees good : he treads down and crushes the mighty, the valiant, and the delicate, without respect of rank, of age, or sex. Wars, pestilences, and famines, are his judgments : conquerors, tyrants, and oppressors are his executioners ; and he is just in all the miseries, which come upon us from their injustice. We should therefore look to him in all our troubles, and

The prophet describes, and mourns over, the desolations of Jerusalem and the miseries of the Jews, as brought on them by the just indignation of God, 1—12. He laments over the unequalled sufferings of the people, who, by hearkening to false prophets, are exposed to the cruel insults of their enemies; and he calls on the sufferers to join with him in tears and prayers, 13—19. enquire, “wherefore he contendeth with us:” we should consider our ways, and confess our sins, and mingle our tears of natural grief for our sufferings, with those of godly sorrow for our sins. We should intreat the Lord to consider and relieve our miseries, and to pardon our transgressions: we should despair of comfort and help from all others, and confidently expect them from his mercy, truth, and power: we should justify him in our sufferings, and condemn ourselves; acknowledging that we “have rebelled against his commandment,” and that grievously. Thus we should pour out our hearts before him, who regards the sighs, and counts the tears, of such as mourn for their sins. Then will he support us under every stroke of his correcting rod; in due time he will vouchsafe us deliverance, and render the whole profitable to our souls; he will restore our privileges and comforts, and confound all our enemies.—Those, who rejoice over the calamities of the Lord’s people, should remember, that “their day also is coming,” when, except they repent of this wickedness, they will be rendered far more contemptible and miserable. We may therefore properly be enquired of all that pass by, whether the sufferings of the people of God be nothing to them: that, even if they have no thought of compassioning, or attempting to alleviate their distresses, they may at least behold and be instructed; they may see in them the holiness of God, the evil of sin, the emptiness of forms, the fatal effects of hypocrisy and impiety; and they may take warning to flee from the wrath to come, by considering the temporal miseries to which sin exposes men in this world. “For if the righteous scarcely are saved; where will the ungodly and the sinner appear?” If the rod of correction be so terrible, what will the sword of vengeance be?—But whatever may be learned by viewing the desolations of Jerusalem, either by the Chaldeans or Romans; more instruction may be derived from “looking unto Jesus,” and his sufferings and death. Does he not, as he were, from the cross, call on every heedless mortal to attend to the interesting scene? Does he not say, “Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by? Behold and see, if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow, wherewith the Lord hath afflicted me, in the day of his fierce anger,” against the sins of those, whom I came to seek and save? Is it nothing to you, that I am here a sinless sufferer? Alas! I, the well beloved Son of the Father, am consumed by the fire of his wrath, and that “my heart in the midst of my bowels is even as melting wax,” and “all my bones out of joint,” and that mine enemies stand staring on me, and insulting over me? Is it nothing to you, that the Father has wreathed on my neck the yoke of man’s transgressions, and laid on me the iniquity of all his people?—I say, does not our suffering Immanuel seem thus to address us? and does it not behove us to consider, who this Sufferer was, what he suffered, and why he suffered at all? Here we may see the evil of sin, the honour of the law, and the justice of God, more than in all the other scenes, which we have been contemplating: here we may learn the worth of our souls, the importance of eternal things, the vanity of the world, and the misery of fallen man. Here we may see the only Foundation of our hope, and the Source of our comfort and happiness. Here we may learn gratitude and patience, meekness and mercy, from the brightest example, and the most endearing motives. Let then all our sorrows lead us to contemplate the cross of Christ, and to mark the way which he took, through sufferings and death to his glory. (Note, Heb. xii. 2, 3.) Thus we shall be comforted under our trials, and cheerfully follow our Fore-runner, assured that “where he is, there we shall be also.”

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1. The prophet had before spoken, as full of astonishment, at the deplorable condition to which Jerusalem was fallen; (Note, i. 1, 2;) but he here enquires, with mingled surprise and regret; how the Lord, the Author of her afflictions, could be induced thus to distress her. Zion had been exalted to heaven in privileges, and in the honour put upon her by the temple and ordinances of God. (Note, Matt. xi. 20—24.) These, with the ark of the covenant, were “the beauty of Israel,” (Notes, i. 4—7. Is. lxiv. 9—12,) and the footstool of JEHOVAH’s throne. (Notes, 1 Chr. xxviii. 2. Ps. xcix. 5.) But now she was covered with a dark cloud from his indignation; the city and temple were cast down to the ground; nor did he remember the temple, or even the ark, so as to preserve either of them in the day of his fierce anger. (Marg. Ref.—Note, Jer. iii. 16—18.)

V. 2. Marg. and Marg. Ref. f, g.—Notes, iii. 42—47. Jer. xiii. 12—14.—Polluted, &c.] The kingdom of Judah had a relative sanctity: but the Lord polluted it, by casting it out of his protection, leaving it in the power of the heathen, and destroying it, notwithstanding the covenant of royalty made with David and his seed. (Marg. Ref. h.—Notes, Ps. lxxxix. 38—45, v. 39. Is. xliii. 26—28. xlvii. 6.)

3 He hath cut off in his fierce anger all ⁱ the horn of Israel: ^k he hath drawn back his right hand from before the enemy, and ^l he burned against Jacob like a flaming fire, which devoureth round about.

4 He hath ^m bent his bow like an enemy: he stood with his right hand as an adversary, and slew all ^{*} that were pleasant to the eye in the tabernacle of the daughter of Zion: ⁿ he poured out his fury like fire.

5 The Lord ^o was as an enemy: ^p he hath swallowed up Israel, he hath swallowed up all her palaces; he hath destroyed his strong-holds, and hath increased in the daughter of Judah ^q mourning and lamentation.

6 And he hath ^r violently taken away his ^t tabernacle, ^s as if it were of a garden; he hath destroyed his places of the assembly: the LORD hath ^u caused the solemn feasts and sabbaths to be forgotten in Zion, and hath despised, in the indignation of his anger, ^v the king and the priest.

7 The Lord hath ^w cast off his altar, he hath abhorred his sanctuary; ^x he hath ^y given up into the hand of the enemy the walls of her palaces; ^z they have made a noise in the house of the LORD, as in the day of a solemn feast.

8 The LORD hath ^a purposed to destroy the wall of the daughter of Zion; he hath ^b stretched out a line, ^c he hath not withdrawn his hand from ^d destroying: therefore ^e he made the rampart and the wall to lament; they languished together.

9 Her ^f gates are sunk into the ground; he hath destroyed and broken her bars; ^g her kings and her princes are among the Gentiles; ^h the law is no more; ⁱ her prophets also find no vision from the LORD.

V. 6. The temple was, with great violence, as completely destroyed by the Chaldeans, as a tent is removed: and the Lord no more regarded it, than a man does a temporary hut, erected in a garden, and pulled down when it is done with. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. r, s.—Notes, Is. i. 7—9. v. 2—7. Matt. xxi. 33—44.) God had destroyed, likewise, "the place of the assembly;" or, "of the congregation." When he took away the temple, he also destroyed the multitude who used to assemble there for worship; and the seasons of assembling, both the sabbath and the stated festivals, were for a time wholly suspended. (Note, Ps. lxxiv. 7, 8.) The kings also of David's favoured race, and the priests of Aaron's consecrated seed, were alike despised by him in his indignation at their sins. (Marg. Ref. g.—Note, 6.)—Her prophets, &c.] Jeremiah himself survived the desolations of Jerusalem, for a considerable time: yet it does not appear, that he delivered any encouraging prophecies to the Jews, after that event: and the most of Ezekiel's predictions, relating to Israel, (except the obscure vision of the temple, &c. in the last chapters of his prophecy,) were delivered about the time when Jerusalem was destroyed and Judea desolated.—Daniel delivered no prophecy, immediately relating to the temporal state of his people, till the seventy years of the captivity were nearly expired. So that there seems to have been, at this period, a very remarkable suspension of that information and encouragement, which the prophets had, for many ages, been employed to communicate to the people.—Except Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel, no prophet is mentioned, from the beginning to the end of the captivity.

10 The ¹elders of the daughter of Zion sit upon the ground, ^kand keep silence: they have ^lcast up dust upon their heads; ^mthey have girded themselves with sackcloth; ⁿthe virgins of Jerusalem hang down their heads to the ground.

when Haggai and Zechariah were raised up.—This chasm was an evident token of divine displeasure, and must have been a very sensible aggravation of the sufferings endured by the pious remnant. (Notes, Ps. lxxiv. 9. Ez. vii. 25, 26.)

Teth, the initial letter of the first word, is, in the Hebrew, printed in a smaller type.—‘The z, it should seem, ‘had by some accident been lost, in the copies they’ (the Masoretick Editors) ‘revised; and though both the sense, ‘and the alphabetical order of the initials required it, they ‘were scrupulous of restoring it without some mark of ‘their doubting concerning its authenticity.’ Blayney.—Such men would not wilfully alter the sacred text.

V. 10. Marg. Ref.—Notes, iii. 26—30, vv. 28, 29. v. 11—16. Job ii. 12, 13. Jer. viii. 14—16, v. 14. Am. viii. 1—3, v. 3. 11—14.

V. 11. The prophet had wept over the calamities of his people, till he had no more power to weep, and his eyes failed to supply tears, nay, were almost blinded. (Marg. Ref. o.) His sorrow occasioned the most painful internal commotion, which greatly affected and disordered his vitals. Violent grief, and other vehement affections, are known to cause excessive bilious disorders, and great evacuations from the gall, which is placed on the liver, and to which the prophet is supposed to refer. (Marg. Ref. p, q.—Job xvi. 13.—Note, Ps. xxii. 14, 15.)—He was peculiarly affected by beholding the young children, and even the suckling infants, fainting and dying for hunger and thirst, in the streets of the city, whilst none had it in their power to relieve them. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. s.—Notes, 12, 18, 19. iv. 3—5.)—The scene is here laid just before the taking of the city.

V. 12. The case of the poor starving children was as desperate, as that of the men, who lay weltering in their blood, and expiring of their wounds: for even, while they were in the arms of their mothers, and supplicated them for nourishment; they expired for want, dying in a lingering and most deplorable manner. (Marg. Ref.—Note, iv. 9.—See on Note, 11.)

V. 13. The prophet wanted to comfort his people by some suitable topick: but he could not have recourse to those, which were commonly employed on such occasions. For who could be found to testify, that he had seen a city visited with as complicated and dire miseries as Jerusalem had been? What misery could he compare and equal with her's, in order to comfort her? (Note, i. 12—17, v. 12. Dan. ix. 12.) Indeed the breach made on her, (like those made by the irruptions of the sea,) was vast, and irreparable by any human power. (Marg. Ref.—Jer. xxx. 12—18.)

V. 14. The false prophets flattered the people with assurances of peace, and thus encouraged them in their sins; and these false visions were the “causes of their banishment,” or captivity: whereas, had they charged the crimes of the people upon their consciences, and called them to repentance, the captivity might have been prevented. (Notes, Is. ix. 13—17. lvi. 9—12. Jer. v. 30, 31. xiv. 13—16. xxiii. 13—32. xxviii. 2—4. 15—17. Ez. xiii. 1—16.)

Foolish things.] חֲזָקִים. The word is rendered “untempered mortar.” (Ez. xiii. 10, 11.)—The word rendered “burdens,” though it generally signifies prophecies of heavy judgments, here means predictions in general: for the false prophets “spake peace when there was no peace.” Yet it may imply that these soothing visions were, in ‘their effects, heavy overwhelming burdens. (Notes, Is. xiii. 1. Jer. xxiii. 33—40.)

V. 15, 16. The idolaters took, as it were, the words

17 The LORD hath ^a done that which he hath devised: he hath fulfilled his word that he had commanded in the days of old: ^o he hath thrown down, and hath not pitied: and ^p he hath caused thine enemy to rejoice over thee, he hath set up the horn of thine adversaries.

V. 18, 19. In the depth of their calamities, the people cried unto the Lord, out of the anguish and distress of their hearts; and called on others to lament over "the wall of the daughter of Zion," which was about to be levelled with the ground, to complete the desolations. The prophet allowed, nay required them thus to give vent to their sorrows, and to weep without intermission, as seasonable and proper: (Marg. Ref. s.—Notes, Ps. cxix. 136. Jer. ix. 1, 2:) but he also excited them to join their nocturnal lamentations with fervent prayers, pouring out their hearts before God, and lifting up their hands towards him: beginning when the night-watches used to be set; employing those hours in ceaseless prayers and tears, which others spent in sleep; and pleading for the life of the young children, which in every street of the city lay dying; that they might not all perish with hunger, and the rising generation of Israel be thus entirely cut off. (Notes, 11, 12. iv. 1—5.)—'As the wall and rampart are said to lament (8), because their ruins are objects of lamentation; so here devout persons...direct their prayers to God, as if the ruins themselves did intreat him to take compassion on the miseries of that place, which he had chosen for his peculiar residence. ...Offer up thy earnest prayers with tears to the throne of grace; and send up thy very soul, and thy devoutest affections with them.' Lowth. (*Marg. V. 20—22. Jerusalem is here introduced as speaking. She intreated the Lord to consider, that he thus afflicted the only people, who worshipped him and were called by his name. Could he then be unconcerned, while the women of Zion ate their own infants, as soon as they were born. This intimation, thus given, fills the mind with the utmost horror, and implies the greatest possible extreme of earthly misery, inducing desperation and barbarity; and our thoughts recoil from it, as too shocking to be dwelt upon. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, iv. 10. Lev. xxvi. 29. Deut. xxviii. 49—57. Luke xxiii. 26—31.)—Hophni and Phinehas, the priests, were slain by the sword in the field of battle; but when Jerusalem was taken, the priests and prophets were slain in the sanctuary, and their blood mingled with that of their sacrifices: (Marg. Ref. c.—Notes, Ez. ix. 5—7. Luke xiii. 1—3:) and to complete their other calamities, the enemies of their nation, at the call of Providence, flocked from all around to profane the temple, and terrify the worshippers; even as the people had been used to flock together to keep their solemn feasts. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.

The mercy of God is immense and “everlasting towards them that fear him:” but no external relations, privileges, or profession, by which men may be exalted, as it were, to heaven, can avail those who have “not the fear of God before their eyes:” for they who think to please the heart-searching God, by hypocritical services, are “a people who have no understanding; and he that made them will not have mercy on them.” (Is. xxvii. 11.) For this cause, the Lord “covered the daughter of Zion “with a cloud in his anger,” “cast down from heaven to “earth the beauty of Israel,” “swallowed up his habitations,” “threw down his strong holds,” “cut off his “horn of defence,” “burned against him as a consuming “fire, and fought against him as an enemy.” And if he did not regard his temple, the ark of his covenant, or the families of Aaron and David; if he cast off his altar, abhorred his sanctuary, and let the heathen profane his most holy place, when the Jews had defiled them by their sins: what hope can there be, that he will regard any forms, where the power of godliness is wanting? (Notes, Jer. vii. 8—15. P. O. 1—15.) These institutions were of divine authority, and of great significance: whereas, most of those things, in which men confide, are human inventions and traditions, unwarranted by the word of God, nay, contrary to it: yet are they persuaded that “the LORD “will do them good, because they have a Levite for their “priest,” an Ephod, Teraphim, and a house of gods or carved idols! (Notes, Judg. xvii. 2—13. P. O.)—But even those doctrines, ordinances, and regulations, which are most exactly scriptural, when scrupulously retained by men destitute of the Spirit of God, are but a lifeless carcase of religion: and when made a cloke for iniquity, God abhors them. So that, in the day of his wrath for national wickedness, he will despise temples and palaces, kings and priests, establishments and forms of every kind.—So long as persons, under heavy afflictions, are permitted without rebuke to vent their indignation on the injurious instruments of their anguish; conscience is soothed and pride flattered, and some transient and pernicious relief is obtained. It therefore becomes a necessary but painful operation, by repeated admonitions to turn the thoughts of proper ground of patient hope, 21—36. He exhorts his people to submit to the sovereignty of God, and humbly to turn unto him, 37—41. He mingles complaints with confessions of sin, 42—54. He appeals to God against his enemies, and beseeches him to execute judgment upon them, 55—66.

the afflicted to the hand of God lifted up against them, and to their sins as the source of their miseries; and to shew that greater miseries impend, except repentance and forgiveness intervene. This should always be attempted, by condoling friends, and the ministers of God. Indeed this requires a delicate and cautious hand: and they are most fit for the difficult service, who actually share the sorrows of the distressed, and mingle compassionate tears with their warnings, instructions, and exhortations. (P. O. Job iv. 1—11.)

V. 13—22.

It is sometimes adviseable, to allow those, who are in extreme affliction, to consider their sorrows as very great; and even to expatiate on the circumstances which most oppress them: and then to give the subject a religious turn, and shew that all their sorrows are deserved, and admit of redress; and that the sources of consolation are far greater, than their greatest griefs can be. Indeed the topics, which philosophy suggests on such occasions, are very feeble and inadequate: it gives little support to the wounded and distressed heart, to hear that others have suffered the same or even greater afflictions; that they are the common lot of man, and cannot be avoided; or that it is more becoming and honourable to bear up under them, than to complain, and repine, and despond. But religion brings us more powerful supports; by leading us to consider the mercy of God, his readiness to pardon; his power to support and comfort; his wisdom, truth, and love, and the blessed effects of sanctified afflictions.—When mourners are brought to cry to the Lord, and “pour out their hearts “before him;” they will not long hang down their heads unto the ground: for he can heal those breaches, which to all others are irreparable; and he will turn our earnest prayers, (though presented with sighs and tears,) into joyful praises. (Notes and P. O. Is. xii.) But, while we contemplate the scenes here set before us; and view the children perishing by famine, slain by the sword, or even made the horrid repast of their frantick mothers; and the prophets and priests “slain in the sanctuary of the LORD:” whilst we view the enemies of Jerusalem “clapping their “hands, wagging their heads, gnashing their teeth, and “saying, Is this the city, that men call the perfection of “beauty, the joy of the whole earth?” and rejoicing in having at length obtained their advantage against her, and swallowed her up: and while on the other hand we consider, that in all this, God performed what he had devised and predicted many ages before; and remember for what and to whom he did this: let us learn to shun false teachers, who “speak smooth things and prophesy deceits;” who do not detect men’s iniquities, but flatter them in their sins; and who thus bring ruin on churches and nations, and on the souls of countless multitudes. Let us fear being deceived: let us beware of hypocrisy, and of trusting in our outward privileges: let us watch and pray against temptation; and learn to fear God, and walk

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1. The construction of this chapter differs from that of those, which have been considered. It consists of the same number of stanzas, according to the number of the letters in the Hebrew alphabet: but every stanza is divided into three parts, or verses, each of which begins with the same Hebrew letter; the first three verses with Aleph, the three next with Beth, &c. and in one instance the order of the letters varies from that which is elsewhere observed.—It also forms a distinct elegy, or lamentation, arranged differently from those which precede. The prophet speaks throughout the whole, lamenting his afflictions, seeking consolatory topicks, and giving counsel and encouragement to his fellow mourners. Some indeed understand it to be the language of a chorus of Jews, speaking as one person: but so many passages evidently refer to Jeremiah's own personal trials, that this interpretation seems inadmissible. ‘The subject of the chapter is penitential meditations upon the prophet's own calamities, as well as those of the publick; together with pious reflections upon the end which God proposes in sending afflictions, and the good use which men ought to make of such chastisements.’ Lowth.—‘I am the man that has seen this great affliction, which the Lord hath in just anger brought upon his people.’ Bp. Hall. Probably, he spake in his own person, as one who, besides his peculiar afflictions, shared largely in those of his nation, and sympathized with them in those from which he was most exempted. He spake of himself as a publick character, for the common benefit; being one of many, who thus shared and mourned over the calamities of Israel.—We have before met with some passages in the writings of Jeremiah, like the bitter complaints of Job: (Notes, Jer. xv. 10. 15—18. xvii. 15—18. xviii. 18—23. xx. 14—18;) here we find various expressions similar to those used by that afflicted and tempted servant of God; and this favours the supposition, that he related the more gloomy and discouraging part of his own experience, and the way in which he found support and relief, as the best method of instructing and comforting his fellow sufferers.—In this view of the chapter, we consider the prophet addressing the afflicted Jews, in order to counsel and encourage them; and speaking as one, who knew the heart of mourners, and could sympathize with them. He was “the man,” who had been peculiarly conversant with affliction, having experienced the effects of God's anger, both for his own sins, and as sharing the punishment inflicted on his people. (Notes, Heb. ii. 16—18. iv. 14—16.)—‘It is worthy to be observed, that Jeremiah, in endeavouring to promote resignation in his countrymen, represents his own deportment under afflictions, in terms which have a prophetic cast; so strikingly are they descriptive of the patience and conduct of our Saviour under his sufferings. The prophet indeed, in the meek endurance of unmerited persecution, was an illustrious type of Christ.’ Gray's Key. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Ps. xxii. xxxviii. lxix. lxxxviii. Jer. xxxvii. xxxviii.)

Seen, &c.] ‘To see is often used by the Hebrew writers, for to feel, taste, or to have experimental knowledge of any thing. (Ps. xlix. 9. lxxxix. 48. xc. 15. Jer. xiv. 13. xvii. 6. 8. Luke ii. 26.)’ Blayney.

V. 2—9. The Lord had not sent his word to the Jews, by a man accustomed to ease and indulgence; but by one whom he had led into great darkness and distress, both in his outward circumstances and his inward experience. (Marg. Ref. b.—Notes, Is. lix. 9—15. Jer. xlii. 15—17. Am v. 18—20.) He had scarcely known prosperity or comfort all his days, but had always been acquainted with grief and sorrow. (Is. liii. 2, 3, v. 3.) The Lord had so tried and distressed him in every thing, that he surely thought, (in the hour of temptation,) that God was turned to be his enemy, and continually employed his power to afflict and punish him. By a succession of sorrows, his body was emaciated, and he was put to great pain and anguish, as if his bones were broken. (Marg. Ref. c—e.—Notes, 17—20. Job xvi. 6—16. Ps. li. 8. Is. xxxviii. 9—13.) God had builded against him, (as the Chaldeans had done against the city,) to exclude all relief from being brought to him, and to prevent his escape. Thus he reduced him to extremities, and surrounded him with the most distressing troubles; which caused him to sink into such despondency, that he was like one cast into a dark dungeon or sepulchre, confined among the remains of the dead, and secluded from the comforts of the living. (Marg. Ref. f—h.—Notes, 52—57. Ps. lxxxviii. 3—9. cxliii. 3.) The entrance of this dismal cave was so barricadoed, that he could not get out; he was loaded with a heavy and galling chain, to increase his misery: and when in this situation he cried to God for help, he shut out his prayer; and would neither hear his requests for his own deliverance, nor for that of his people. Thus his path was closed up as by stone walls, and he was lost in a labyrinth, from which he could not extricate himself. (Marg.

Shutteth, &c. (8) ‘It is a great temptation to the godly when they see not the fruit of their prayers, and causeth them to think that they are not heard; which thing God useth to do, that they might pray more earnestly, and the oftener.’

V. 10—13. The prophet seems to have enlarged on his discouragements, preparatory to the account which he intended to give of his supports and comforts.—In the season of his trouble and temptation, the Lord became terrible to him; as a bear or a lion, which suddenly rushes from its covert upon the traveller, turns him out of his way, or tears him in pieces: (Marg. Ref. n, o.—Notes, Job x. 14—17. Hos. v. 13, 14. xlii. 5—8:) for God had made him desolate, destroyed all his comforts, set him as a mark for his arrows, and wounded him by them in his vitals. (Marg. Ref. p—r.—Notes, Job vi. 1—4. xvi. 6—16. Ps. xxxviii. 1, 2.)—In speaking of his own sufferings, he also referred to those of the Jews, in which he was so deeply interested: and some expressions may best suit his own case, and others that of the people.—*Arrows. V. 14—16. In the midst of his other troubles, the prophet was derided and insulted by the people, over whose approaching calamities he so pathetically mourned; and they made him the subject of their profane songs, for which they were at length made a derision and a song to their enemies. (Marg. Ref. s.—63. Notes, Job xxx. 1—4. Ps. lxix. 10—12.) Thus the Lord filled him with bitterness, and intoxicated him with the nauseous cup, of which he made him to drink, instead of the cordials, which his case seemed to require. V. 17—20. Here the prophet, addressing himself to God, complained that he had removed his soul to the greatest distance from peace, and had made him forget prosperity, through a long continuance of adversity.—‘So Joseph speaking of the seven years of famine, saith, that “plenty shall be forgotten in the land of Egypt.” (Gen. xli. 30.)’ Lowth. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. z, a.—Note, Is. lxv. 16.) He was even brought to the borders of despair; as if he could have no help from the Lord, or hope in him, both being perished together. These thoughts harassed him, whilst he ruminated on his complicated and bitter troubles; and the more he revolved them in his mind, the greater depression of spirits he experienced; being bowed down, not only in humiliation, but in deep dejection, as the word often means. ‘Thus with pain he was driven to and fro between hope and despair, as the godly oft-times are; yet in the end the spirit getteth the victory.’ (*Marg. and Marg. I remember my despondency and am humbled for it; and also my unexpected past deliverances, which encourages my hope for the future.’—The generality of commentators, however, join it with the following verses.—‘The reflections, set down in the following verses, are a sufficient ground for our trust in God under the severest trials.’ Lowth.—‘I recall to mind these following considerations, and thereupon I conceive hope and com‘fort.’ Bp. Hall. This connexion seems most obvious; according to which the prophet, having stated the extremity of his distress and temptation, proceeds to shew how he was raised above them. (Notes, Ps. lxxiii. lxxvii.) He recollected, under his temptations, that, as a sinner, he might have been cut off, and cast into the pit of destruction, and should certainly have thus perished, but for the mercies of God: while his people would have been totally consumed, and no remnant of them left. As, however, the Lord had mercifully spared him, and had not utterly destroyed them; as his compassions were plenteous and unfailing, and every morning renewed to him, in the continuance of his life and many unmerited benefits; and as God had given many precious promises to Israel and to every believer, and in his great faithfulness had always performed them to those who trusted in them: so he found there was yet encouragement to hope, and to exercise patience and repentance, in expectation of returning comfort. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, 1 Sam. vii. 12. Ps. lxxvii. 5—12. cvi. 40—48. Is. lxiii. 15—19. 2 Cor. i. 8—11. 2 Tim. iv. 16—18.)—Therefore have I hope. (21) Or, Therefore I will hope.

V. 24, 25. It next occurred to the prophet, that whatever he lost or suffered, or witnessed of the sufferings of his people, his grand interest was secure. He was satisfied that JEHOVAH was his all-sufficient Portion. (Marg. Ref. k, l.—Notes, Gen. xv. 1. Ps. lxxiii. 23—28, v. 26. Jer. x. 16.) He was conscious, that he had chosen him as his Portion, and expected his happiness from him, and not from the world: and therefore he determined still to hope in him, and refer all his concerns to his wisdom, truth, and love. In this, he evidently proposed himself as an example to his people, that they might seek comfort from God, when all other comfort failed. (Note, Hab. iii. 17—19.) And, though they might not be able confidently to aver, that “the LORD was their Portion;” yet they might remember, that he was kind and merciful to those who waited for him and sought him. (Marg. Ref. n.—Notes, 1 Chr. xvi. 10, 11. Is. lv. 6, 7.)

V. 26—30. The wisest, best, and most comfortable way, which the afflicted people could take, would be to watch against murmurs and despondency; to hope in God for support and deliverance; to submit resignedly to his will, and wait his time; to use appointed and proper means, and no other; and thus, in composure and confidence, to wait for the performance of his promises of temporal and eternal salvation. (Marg. Ref. m, p, q.—Notes, Gen. xlix. 18. Ex. xiv. 13, 14. Ps. xxvii. 13, 14. xl. 1—5. lxii. 1, 2. 5—7. cxxx. 5—8. Is. xxx. 18, 19. xl. 27—31. Mic. vii. 5—7, v. 7. Jam. v. 7, 8.) This would be good in itself, honourable to God, and profitable to them. It would also be good and useful to bear the yoke in youth: as it must be allowed to be beneficial, that young persons should be inured to hardship, subjection, and discipline; it must be also good for men to be early habituated to affliction, and resignation to the will of God; to learn subjection to his authority, and to bear his yoke. Such afflictions and disappointments would tend to take the thoughts off from the world, and to check the eagerness of men’s pursuits and expectations. Thus the sufferer would be induced to court solitude and retirement, and to employ himself in serious reflection; because he would perceive, that God had laid these burdens upon him: or, he would be led to take them patiently as from him. And, when he considered that the Lord afflicted men for their sins, and to bring them to repentance; he would “put his mouth in the dust,” through self-abasement, confessing his sins, and welcoming the chastisement; “if so be, there might be hope” of “deliverance from the wrath to come.” (Marg. Ref. o, r—t.—Notes, 2 Chr. xxxiii. 12, 13. Job xlii. 1—6. Ps. iv. 3—5, v. 4. Ez. xvi. 60—63. Matt. xi. 28—30. Rom. iii. 19, 20. Heb. xii. 4—11. Jam. i. 2—4. 9—12.) In this temper, the afflicted penitent would meekly yield to the injuries of men, as the correction of God: “give his cheek to the smiter,” and patiently endure the reproaches, with which he should be loaded. (Note, 2 Sam. xvi. 5—14.) This Christ did, though without sin; and the penitent sufferer will learn to imitate his example.—The scope of the prophet was, to shew the advantages, which might be derived from afflictions: and as this consideration tended to compose his own mind; he proposed it to his people, in order to reconcile them to their sufferings, and to teach them to profit by them.—‘He not only humbles himself in the sight of God; but likewise patiently bears the ill treatment of men. Is. i. 6.’ Lowth. (Marg. Ref. x, y.—Notes, Ps. xxii. 4—8. lxix. 8, 9. 16—20. cxxiii. 3, 4. Is. i. 5, 6. Mic. v. 1. Matt. v. 38—42, v. 39. xxvi. 63—68, v. 67.)

rejected the penitent, cast off the believer, or meant to forsake his people Israel: there was therefore still hope, both in their personal and publick concerns. (Marg. Ref. z.—Notes, 1 Sam. xii. 22. Ps. lxxvii. 5—12. Jer. xxxiii. 14—26. Rom. xi. 1—6.) For the honour of his justice, holiness, and truth, the Lord often “caused grief:” yet his manifold and infinite mercies disposed him to compassionate the sufferers; and to relieve them, when their sorrows had produced a salutary effect. Even in his ordinary dealings with “the children of men,” he did not willingly afflict them, or “from his heart,” as taking pleasure in their sufferings, or without cause; but from a wise regard to his own glory, and the benefit of his universal kingdom. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. a, b.—Notes, Ez. xviii. 23. Heb. xii. 4—11.) He was not like those oppressors, who delighted in crushing under their feet their prisoners or vassals; and who would thus enslave and trample down the whole earth, if they could. Much less would the Lord delight in afflicting his people, who submitted and humbled themselves before him. And, as he did not use his power to oppress, or to do injustice, by prerogative; so he would never authorize it in others. He could not approve of those, who as in his presence deprived others of their right, or supplanted them in their causes: and therefore, as the Chaldeans had done the Jews great injustice; the latter might be sure, that God would in due time plead their cause against their oppressors. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. c—f.—Notes, Is. xiv. 1, 2. xlvii. 6. lviii. 5—7. Jer. xxv. 8—12. l. 11—14.)

(Ps. xxxiii. 6.) And ever since nothing is brought to pass, but according to his determinate counsel and foreknowledge; who, as he makes men the instruments of his vengeance, so he can restrain

‘their cruelty whenever he sees fit. ... Do not calamities ‘come from his will and disposal, as well as prosperity?’ Lowth.—When therefore the calamities of the Jews had produced the proper effect; the purposes of their oppressors would be frustrated, and they would no longer be able to enslave or afflict them. (Notes, Ps. lxxvi. 10. 2 Cor. iv. 5, 6. v. 6.)
V. 39—41. As all sinners deserve death and destruction, and are exposed to be crushed every moment; so none, whose life is prolonged, who is out of hell and may hope for heaven, has either right or reason to complain, while suffering the temporal punishment of his sins, which is far less than he deserves.—‘As long as men are on this ‘side of the grave, they ought to be thankful, for having an ‘opportunity given them for repentance.’ Lowth. (Note, 2 Pet. iii. 14—16.)—The prophet therefore checked his own complaints, and those of his people, and called them to join with him in diligent self examination, and a serious trial of all their ways; that they might discover and repent of all their sins, and return to the Lord, trusting in his mercy and worshipping his name. He reminded them also, not to rest in formally lifting up their hands to God; but “to lift up their hearts also;” considering the greatness and holiness of Him, whose glory filled the heavens, though he condescended to notice their worship on earth. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—See on Note, 21—23.—Notes, Deut. iv. 29—31. xxx. 1—10. Ps. xxv. 1. cxxxix. 23, 24. Is. lv. 6, 7. Jer. iii. 12—15. xxxi. 18—20. Hos. vi. 1—3. xiv. 1—3. Jam. iv. 7—10.)
V. 42—47. Some connect these verses with the preceding, by the word, Saying;—“Let us lift up, &c.” Saying, “We have transgressed &c.” The prophet however, proceeded to direct the confessions of his people, and to put words into their mouths. He humbly acknowledged, that they had transgressed and rebelled against God; and, as he had not pardoned, it was plain they had not repented: this was the cause of all their miseries, of which he led them humbly and submissively to complain to the Lord. He had covered them with his anger, pursued them by his judgments, and destroyed them without pity: and he had covered himself with a thick cloud, so that their prayers could find no admission. (Marg. Ref. p—x.—Notes, Is. lxiv. 6—12. Dan. ix. 4—19.) The hypocritical prayers of the people for deliverance were rejected; and even the fervent prayers of the prophet in that behalf were discouraged. Thus the Lord made them “as the offscouring and refuse” of the nations, who insulted and trampled upon them; and opened their mouths in reproaches, menaces, boasts, and blasphemies, against them and their holy religion: and the people of Israel were overwhelmed with terrors, entangled in snares, and given up to desolation and ruin.

V. 48—51. The prophet here again spake in his own person, and of his share in the public calamities. He wept incessantly for the destruction of his people and of Jerusalem; and must do so, “till the LORD should look down from heaven,” to regard and redress their calamities. Every object which he saw affected his heart, and renewed his sorrows: but especially, when he saw the daughters of Jerusalem fallen into the hands of the brutal conquerors, and exposed to every kind of violence without

V. 52—57. Jeremiah seems here more immediately to speak of his own trials; with reference to the case of his people, and the public calamities of the church.—He had given no cause to his enemies to hate him: and yet they eagerly chased him as a bird, in order to destroy him. They thought they had cut him off, when they had let him down into the dungeon, and covered him over with a great stone, as if buried alive: (Marg. Ref. h. 1.—Notes, Jer. xxxviii. 1—6. Dan. vi. 12—17. Matt. xxvii. 62—66:) and he seemed to himself as certainly cut off, as if the waters had flowed over his head. (Marg. Ref. m, n.—Notes, Ps. lxxix. 1—3. Jon. ii. 3—7.) Yet out of this low dungeon he had called upon the Lord: he had pleaded with him that he had heretofore heard his voice; and intreated him, that he would not now hide his ear from his sighs, and the breathings of his soul in prayer. God had been used to draw near to him, when he prayed; to silence his fears, to plead his cause, and rescue his life: and to him he appealed in that emergency; nor had his request been denied. CHAP. IV.

The prophet deplores the ruin of the city and temple; and the extreme misery of the people, especially by famine, 1—12. He ascribes these calamities to the sins of the prophets and priests; and shews how their allies disappointed them, and their enemies pursued them, 13—20. He predicts the termination of Zion's calamities, and judgments upon insulting Edom, 21, 22.

and contempt: and he therefore besought the righteous Judge to plead his cause, which he unreservedly committed to him. (Marg. Ref. x—e.—Notes, Jer. xi. 18—23. xv. 15—18. xviii. 18—23. xx. 10—13.) The verbs in the concluding verses are all future, not imperative, nor any thing in the least requiring an optative construction; a prophecy, and not an imprecation; what Jeremiah foresaw and foretold, without so much as a hint that he desired or prayed for it. “Thou wilt render them a recompence, &c.” “Thou wilt give them sorrow,” or obstinacy, “of heart,” “thy curse upon them. Thou wilt persecute and destroy them, &c.” Even the Septuagint renders the passage in this manner: and it is hard to say, what induced modern translators in general, to give it the form of a most tremendous imprecation; which certainly should not be done in any case, without evident necessity: among other important reasons, especially, because it gives the enemies of revelation, and consequently of the ancient prophets, a plausible ground of representing them, as men of a malevolent and vindictive spirit.—“Thou wilt render, &c.” Blayney. This learned critick renders the whole in the future. (Notes, Ps. xxxv. 4—9. xl. 14—16. lxviii. 1—3. cix. 6—20.)—The event had fully proved, that the Lord heard and answered Jeremiah's prayer from the dungeon: and this might well encourage the church, in her deep distress and misery, (when she was as it were, cast into the pit, overwhelmed, and ready to perish, amidst the insults and contempt of her enemies,) to expect deliverance from the power and mercy of God, in answer to the prayers of her afflicted sons, and attended with the predicted vengeance on her persecutors. This seems to be the intention of the prophet. For if God had not disregarded the cries of one afflicted servant; could it be supposed, that he would leave his whole church to sink for ever in her trouble, and not answer the prayers of all his people, and avenge them on their oppressors? (Marg. Ref. f—k.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS

V. 1—20.

They are best qualified to administer counsel and consolation to the afflicted, who have themselves experienced the anguish and terror of the rod of divine wrath: and therefore ministers often pass through heavy trials, that they may learn to speak seasonably to the afflicted. (Note, 2 Cor. i. 1—7.)—It is very profitable, in speaking to the distressed and wounded in conscience, to shew them out of what troubles and temptations we ourselves have been delivered; and in what way we have been led to peace and confidence in God.—The suffering and tempted believer has very different views of the Lord's dealings with him, in the midst of his conflicts, than at other times: the struggle betwixt unbelief and faith, flesh and spirit, is often very sharp: and outward troubles concur with inward discouragement. (Note, and P. O. Job iii. 1—10.) Indeed, the Lord sometimes leads his most eminent servants “into darkness and not into light;” and they are apt to conclude, that he is punishing them as an enemy, and not correcting them as a Father: his hand seems turned against them all the day; the body is affected with the disquietude of the mind: God himself appears to exclude their souls from comfort, to put them to pain, to hedge up their way, to “shut out their prayers” and earnest cries, to plunge them into perplexity, to envelope them in darkness, and to be in every way formidable to them. But, whether our God frown, or our enemies deride and insult; and whether our comforts be turned into “gall and wormwood,” or “our souls forget prosperity;” we may be assured, that it is our infirmity and temptation, if we think, “that our strength and hope are perished from the LORD.” Indeed, if we only consider our affliction and misery; or the power, justice, and holiness of God, compared with our guilt and pollution; and do not view him on a mercy-seat and ready to forgive; instead of being properly humbled before him, we shall sink into despondency. Thus conscious guilt may even “swallow us up in overmuch sorrow,” and give Satan an advantage against us; and it is of great importance to be aware of his devices. (Note, 2 Cor. ii. 5—11.) But if we properly recall to mind the Lord's goodness, we shall have hope in our darkest hours: and we should consider how others have found comfort in similar circumstances; that when we too have found relief, we may point it out to our brethren.

The due consideration of the evil of sin and our own sinfulness will convince us, that “it is of the LORD's mercies we are not consumed.” If they had not been more abundant even than our provocations, we should not now be in the land of hope, of pardon, of prayer; but in the region of vengeance, blasphemy, and despair. And how much worse might it have been with us, than now it is! How many have been cut off, and perished in their sins! How many on earth are suffering far more severe pains than we are! How many sufferers have no acquaintance with their guilt and danger! and what severe and long continued self-denial has God often required of his most honoured servants, which they found it their wisdom and duty, and eventually their happiness, to submit to in humble patience! How meekly, submissively, and thankfully ought we to bear our lighter cross, and exercise that moderate self-denial to which he calls us! and how shameful, if we repine, despond, or seek relief by sin! These and similar reflections will suggest reasons for gratitude even in our afflictions, and for hope in our dejections. He who has hitherto spared us, and whose “compassions are new to us every morning,” still “waiteth to be gracious:” great is his sincerity in his invitations, and faithfulness to his promises; and he has promised to teach and help all who desire to come, as well as to receive all who do come to him. If we cannot then say, with unwavering voice, “The LORD is my Portion;” may we not say, ‘I desire to have him for my Portion and salvation, and in his word do I hope? We may wait on him and seek him, assured of success. Let us then watch against despondency, as well as presumption; and count it "good to hope and quietly to wait for the salvation of the LORD." We should also remember, that many have found the galling yoke of affliction salutary and useful; and in the severe school of adversity have learned repentance, patience, and godliness. As that is always best for us, which most conduces to the salvation of our souls; we cannot too soon be initiated in this profitable discipline. Happy then is it, when disappointments and troubles teach young persons to retire, "to sit alone," to "keep silence" from vain words, and to give themselves to meditation and prayer; whilst others, of their age, are running the round of folly and vice, and making abundant provision for future anguish and misery. And happy shall we all be, if we learn so to receive affliction, (considering that it is laid upon us by the hand of God,) as to extract good out of it. In order to this we must abase ourselves before him, in the deepest humiliation: and then, whatever reproach or injurious treatment we receive, we shall be conscious that we have no cause to complain, whilst we have the hope of his favour, and are thus made "partakers of his holiness." This submission and dependence on God must be safe and advantageous: for "he will not cast off for ever" any who trust in him. "Though he cause grief," yet "he delighteth in mercy," and not in afflicting the children of men: and when he has humbled and proved us, he will "have compassion, according to the multitude of his mercies," and "do us good at the latter end." Indeed, he often permits the instruments of his correction or his vengeance, to crush their subjects or prisoners under their feet: but he cannot approve of injustice or oppression. Nor can they exceed their commission, or do mischief according to their own will; for good and evil are dispensed at the mouth of God. When therefore his wise and righteous ends are answered, he terminates the power of oppressors, and rescues the oppressed. Our troubles are all from him: and when our peace is made with him, all things will certainly "work together for our good." Instead then of fretting and complaining, when we suffer a small part of the punishment due to our sins; whilst the continuance of life gives ground for hope and time for prayer; we should employ ourselves in "searching and trying our ways," in repenting of our sins and "returning unto the LORD;" and in lifting up our hearts and prayers unto our heavenly Father. We should complain to him, and not of him; and the representation of our sorrows should be always accompanied with humble confession of our manifold and heinous transgressions.

V. 42—66.

If the Lord has "not pardoned" our sins, we may be sure, that it is because we have not repented and believed his gospel: yet it is possible, that we are forgiven, even though we have not the comfort of it. If we be covered with his anger, and our prayers be not answered; it may be, because we ask amiss, or have not patiently waited his time. If we be made "as the filth of the world," treated as the refuse of mankind, and insulted by our neighbours; we should the more earnestly look to our God, and expect him to plead our cause and deliver us. But indeed, our own troubles, and those of the church and world around us, continually suggest causes of sorrow: and wherever we look, "our eyes may affect our hearts," and cause our tears to flow afresh. Yet we may still hope and rejoice in the Lord: no dark dungeon or deep pit can exclude us from his throne of grace. (Note, Acts xvi. 25—28.) If we cannot speak, he will hear our breathings and our sighs. (Note, Rom. viii. 24—27, vv. 26, 27.) He will draw near to encourage, to defend, and to plead the cause of his afflicted servants, and to redeem their souls.—But what are all our sorrows compared with those of the Redeemer? "He" indeed "was the man, who saw affliction, by the rod of the LORD's wrath" against our sins; and exclaimed, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" He "gave his cheek to the smiters, and was filled with reproach:" he was cut off, and laid in the grave, and the stone covered him: yet his prayer was answered, his cause was pleaded, he rose triumphant, and his enemies have, many of them, perished miserably from "under the heavens of the LORD." Thus will he deliver his people out of every trouble, and revive his church from every overwhelming persecution: thus will he raise our bodies from the grave, and save us with an everlasting salvation; whilst all his enemies will perish with an "everlasting destruction from his presence." (Notes, 2 The. i. 5—10. Rev. xx. 11—15.)

NOTES

CHAP. IV. V. 1, 2. The nation of Israel being devoted to God and beloved by him, and Jerusalem the holy city where he was worshipped at his temple, had excelled other nations and cities, as the most fine gold does the baser metals; which was intimated by the gold that over-laid the walls, and formed the vessels, of the sanctuary. (Notes, 1 Kings vi. 15—35. vii. 48—51.) But now they were both polluted by their sins, and disgraced by their sufferings; they had lost all their distinguished splendour and excellency, and were become base and contemptible. The temple also was totally destroyed, and its stones were thrown among the common rubbish, and mixed with the ruins of other buildings. Nay, the "sons of Zion," even the most honourable and eminent of them, who ought to have been, and had been, "precious as fine gold," were disregarded and dashed in pieces like the meanest earthen vessel. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Is. xxx. 12—14. li. 17—20, v. 20. Jer. xxii. 28—30. Rom. ix. 19—23. 2 Cor. iv. 7.)

V. 3—5. Through urgent famine, the women of Jerusalem seemed to be deprived of all natural affection, and young ones: 'the daughter of my people is become cruel, 'like the ostriches in the wilderness.

4 The ^s tongue of the sucking child cleaveth to the roof of his mouth for thirst: 'the young children ask bread, and no man breaketh it unto them.

5 They ¹ that did feed delicately are desolate in the streets: they that were brought up in scarlet ¹ embrace dung-hills.

6 For the ^{*} punishment of the iniquity of the daughter of my people is greater than ^m the punishment of the sin of Sodom, that was overthrown as in a moment, and no hands stayed on her.

7 Her ⁿ Nazarites were ^o purer than snow, they were whiter than milk, they were more ruddy in body than rubies, their polishing was of sapphire.

8 Their ^p visage is [†] blacker than a coal; ^q they are not known in the streets: ^r their skin cleaveth to their bones; it is withered, it is become like a stick.

9 They that be slain with the sword are better than they that be slain with hunger: 'for these 'pine away, stricken through for want of the fruits of the field.

10 The ^u hands of the ^v pitiful women have sodden their own children, they were their meat ^x in the destruction of the daughter of my people.

11 The ^y LORD hath accomplished his fury; he hath poured out his fierce anger, and hath ^z kindled a fire in Zion, and it hath devoured the foundations thereof.

... were become more unfeeling to their offspring than the sea-monsters, or other savage creatures. In endeavouring to preserve their own lives, they neglected to tend on their infants; and thus left them to perish, as the ostrich does her eggs, which she leaves on the sand and looks no more after them: (Note, Job xxxix. 13—18:) and some of them were even far more cruel (10). Thus the sucking child was parched to death by thirst; the lisping children, begging for bread, were left to perish by hunger; and such as had been brought up most delicately, and with every indulgence, lay neglected in the streets, or upon dunghills, without other lodging, or other food than they could rake out of them. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Deut. xxviii. 49—57, v. 54—56. Is. iii. 16—26. xlvii. 1—3.)—Sea-monsters. 3) Marg. It is, I believe, now generally agreed, that whales, and several other sea-monsters, bring forth their young, and suckle them, as land-animals do: though some learned expositors, taking it for granted, that this was not, in any instance, the case, have proposed other translations, which do not seem admissible.

V. 6. Sodom was destroyed at once by fire from heaven, and its inhabitants did not suffer so much, in this world, as those of Jerusalem did, when they died in a lingering manner by famine, like criminals who are long kept in torture. And, considering the superior advantages and privileges of Jerusalem, there can be no doubt, that their guilt was far more aggravated than that of Sodom.—This deed is the more obvious sense of the original. (Marg.) The punishment of Jerusalem was heavier than that of Sodom, because her guilt was more aggravated. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 9. Ex. xvi. 48—51. Matt. xi. 20—24.)

V. 7, 8. (Notes, Gen. xlix. 22—26, v. 26. Num. vi. 3—21. Am. ii. 9—12.) The Nazarites, during the time of their separation, were considered as very distinguished persons; and probably they used to wear white clothing. Perhaps God had been pleased to give a peculiar blessing to their diet, to render them more healthy than their brethren, who did not abstain from wine; so that their appearance was more vigorous and comely, and they were considered as the ornament and honour of the city. (Note, Dan. i. 8—16.) But now the wrath of God had made such a change in their circumstances; that by famine, disease, and neglect, they were become base and sordid in their persons and apparel, not to be distinguished from the other wretched objects, with whom they were surrounded: and they were emaciated and enfeebled, so that their very neighbours scarcely knew them. (Marg. Ref.)

Blacker than a coal. (8) "Darker than blackness." (Marg. and Marg. Ref. p.) "Duskier than the dawn." '... שחר, signifies the dawn of the day, when it is neither light nor dark, but between both, at which time objects are not easily distinguished.' Blayney. (Note, Is. viii. 20.)

V. 9. Marg. Ref. Note, 6.—Stricken, &c.] 'Their vitals are pierced through, as if ... with a sword; but with this difference, that it is by famine, the most cruel, because 'the most lingering death.' Lowth.

V. 10. In themselves the women of Israel were strongly disposed to compassion, and still more to exquisite natural affection: but, notwithstanding this, their extreme anguish rendered them barbarous and savage, and this added exceedingly to the horror of their calamity and conduct. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, ii. 20—22, v. 20. 2 Kings vi. 28, 29. Is. xlix. 14—16.)

both by nature and art: and those, who had attempted to take it, had almost always been miraculously baffled and destroyed. This induced the decided opinion among all the surrounding kings and nations, that Nebuchadnezzar would not succeed in his enterprize. Nor could he, if the Lord, the real Defence of Jerusalem, had not been provoked to depart from her.—‘These things are come to pass, ^t contrary to all men’s expectations.’ (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Ps. xlviii. 1—8.)

V. 13—16. The sins of the false prophets, and ungodly priests, conduced to the total degeneracy of the nation; and their murder of the prophets and righteous servants of God, and of the children offered to idols, provoked him to give them up to destruction. (Marg. Ref. b, c.—Notes, ii. 14. Jer. ii. 26—30. vi. 13—15. xxiii. 13—29. Ez. xxii. 25, 26. Mic. iii. 8—12. Matt. xxiii. 34—39. Acts vii. 51—53.) Thus the prophets and priests caused such numbers to be slain, that when they walked in the streets, they could not avoid being polluted with blood; as blind men, when wandering about, could not shun those things, the touch of which rendered them unclean. Nay, they were even covered with the blood of the slain, so that men could not touch their garments without being defiled. Or, in the punishment of their crimes, such numbers were slain on every side, that they could not avoid pollution by touching blood; any more than blind men could.—The Jews had been wont to say to a Gentile, “Stand by thyself, I am holier than thou;” and to bid him depart, and keep at a distance, as unclean: but now the very heathen drove them out of the city as unclean, and burned it as polluted.—‘They used the same words to express their abhorrence of this defilement of such persons, whose office it was to cleanse and purify others, as the lepers were by the law obliged to pronounce on themselves, and cry “Unclean, unclean.” (Lev. xiii. 45.)’ Lowth. They considered them as monsters of wickedness, and in contempt of their former pride and self-preference, or as loathing their vile conduct, they disdainfully shunned their company: nay, when they fled, or wandered from place to place, even the idolaters would not admit them to sojourn with them! Thus the Lord divided them into distant places: (Note, Gen. xlix. 5—7:) he no longer regarded them as his people; and therefore their enemies no more respected their priests and elders, but considered them as the chief criminals, and the peculiar objects of their execration. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. d—i.)

V. 17. Vain, &c.] The Jews had long expected help from the Egyptians but wholly in vain; and this was one occasion of their ruin. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Is. xxx. 6, 7. xxxi. 2, 3. Jer. xxxvii. 1—10. Ez. xxix. 6, 7.)

V. 18, 19. These are the desponding complaints of the remnant of the Jews. Their enemies hunted those, who remained in the city, from one street to another; so that they expected death every moment: and if any of them fled to the mountains, or into the wilderness, their pursuers were as swift as eagles, and laid wait for them to destroy them. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 2 Kings xxv. 1—5. Jer. v. 30, 31. Ez. vii. 5—15. xii. 1—16. 26—28. Am. viii. 1—3.)—‘God has brought upon us that judgment which he threatened by Moses, of bringing “a nation against us “as swift as the eagle flieth.” (Deut. xxviii. 49.)’ Lowth. (Notes, Jer. iv. 11—13. Matt. xxiv. 26—28.)

V. 20. ‘This verse some expositors understand of king Josiah; and thereupon ground their opinion, that the Lamentations were written on occasion of his death. ... But I rather conceive that Zedekiah was meant, of whom the prophet saith, that he was taken in those toils his enemies had laid to catch him. (Jer. lii. 8. Ez. xii. 13.) As long as he was safe, we had hopes of preserving some face of government, although we were carried into a foreign country.’ Lowth.—Perhaps the hopes of the nation, when Zedekiah was first anointed king, are intended. He was raised to the throne by the king of Babylon; and therefore they might expect to be preserved by his power from the surrounding heathen nations, and to continue in their own land: so that they considered their national existence, so to speak, to depend on Zedekiah. But when he was hunted and taken, as a wild beast in a pit, all their hopes expired. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 2 Kings xxv. 6, 7. Jer. xxxiv. 1—5. xxxvii. 17—21. Ez. xvii. 12—21. xxi. 25—27.)

anointed of the LORD, ^r was taken in their pits, of whom we said, Under his shadow we shall live among the heathen.

21 ¶ Rejoice and ^s be glad, O daughter of Edom, that dwellest in ^t the land of Uz; ^u the cup also shall pass through

22 * The ^y punishment of thine iniquity is accomplished, O daughter of Zion; ^z he will no more carry thee away into captivity: ^a he will visit thine iniquity, O daughter of Edom; he will [†] discover thy sins.

V. 21, 22. (Note, i. 18—22, v. 21.) The Edomites insulted and rejoiced over the calamities of the Jews. (Notes, Ps. cxxxvii. 7—9. Jer. xlix. 7—22. Ez. xxv. 12—14. xxxv. Am. i. 11, 12. Ob. 10—21.) The prophet therefore ironically bade them rejoice; but assured them that their joy would soon be terminated: for the deadly cup of divine vengeance would speedily be put into their hands, and reduce them to desperation and contempt. (Marg. Ref. u, x.—Notes, Ps. lxxv. 8. Is. li. 17—23. Jer. xxv. 15—17. 27, 28. Hab. ii. 15—17.) The appointed punishment of Zion would soon be completed, and her captivity terminated: and then the Lord would bring to light and punish the iniquities of Edom; or carry them into captivity for their sins. (Note, Is. xl. 1, 2.)

Uz. (21) Note, Job i. 1.—No more. (22) ‘These and such like expressions, if understood in a strict literal sense, must relate to the final restoration of the Jews. (Jer. xxxi. 40. Is. lii. 1.)’ Lowth. (Notes, Ez. xxxiv. 23—31. xxxvii. 25—28. xxxix. 23—29. Hos. iii. 4, 5. Joel ii. 9—17. Am. ix. 13—15. Mic. vii. 8—17.)—Edom is frequently introduced, as representing the enemies of the church in general; and the final restoration of the Jews will be accompanied with the entire ruin of all the adversaries of the church, or speedily succeeded by it. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. y—a.—Notes, Is. xxxiv. lxiii. 1—6. Mal. 2—5.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.

The glory of outward distinctions and privileges may soon be obscured: sin tarnishes the beauty of the most excellent gifts; and when the Lord leaves churches or nations, their “glory is departed.” But that “gold tried in the fire” which Christ bestows, will never be taken from us; nor can its excellency be diminished. (Note, Lev. iii. 18, 19, v. 18.)—The stones of the earthly sanctuary were repeatedly poured out in the streets, so that not one of them was left upon another: but the spiritual temple experiences no such demolitions; it is built upon a rock, against which the gates of hell cannot prevail; and every believer being one with Christ, is “an habitation of God through the Spirit.” (Notes, Eph. ii. 19—22. Pet. ii. 4—6.)—Indeed, the most “precious of the sons of Zion,” incomparably more valuable in the sight of God than the finest gold, are esteemed by ungodly men as earthen pitchers,” fit for nothing but the basest uses, to be dashed in pieces; and not only were prophets and apostles treated in this manner, but even Christ himself was despised and vilified more than any of them.—They who live themselves, and bring up their children, in delicacy, elegance, and splendour, know not to what miseries they may be reserved: and such as are most habituated to luxury and indulgence, must be doubly miserable, if reduced to the extremes of hunger and thirst, and squalid penury, to lie on the ground, and to “embrace “dunghills.” It is therefore our interest to accustom ourselves to hardships, to deny our appetites improper gratifications, and to fear contracting such habits as may afterwards prove sources of misery.—Extreme necessity has a tendency to render the heart callous and unfeeling: they, who have improperly indulged their children when in prosperity, have often been most regardless of them in distress: and the human species has frequently been found more cruel and insensible, than the most ferocious and stupid of the irrational creatures.—The punishment of the most abandoned heathens will be light, compared with that of wicked nominal Christians: but, if the lingering pains of a tedious execution, of famine, or of some fatal disease, are so terrible; what will be the everlasting punishment of the wicked, when “the LORD shall accomplish his fierce anger, “and pour out his fury upon them” as “consuming fire!”

No enemy can prevail against us, unless God withdraw his protection: and if he do, no defence can avail. But the wickedness of those, who are by office engaged to support religion, and yet betray her interests, is the great cause of national judgments, and of the ruin of flourishing churches: especially, when they have “shed the blood “of the just” in the midst of them. Those who have thus polluted their garments, have commonly been recompensed in the same way; and rendered an execration even to the vilest of mankind.—The eyes of those, who have provoked the Lord to have no more regard to them, must “fail, in looking for vain help from such as cannot “save:” but they who trust in him shall never be confounded.—Men who are most presumptuous in prosperity, are most apt to despond in danger and trouble: and they, who have before despised the warnings and counsels of the Lord’s ministers, are often excessively terrified, when their end draws nigh and their days are fulfilled; and when they can find no escape from the close pursuit of “the king of “terrors.”—If we so over-rate any creature, as to account it “the breath of our nostrils,” or expect “to live under “its shadow;” we shall surely meet with disappointments and confusion: but our anointed King is indeed the Life of our souls, and we may safely live under his shadow, and rejoice in him in the midst of all our enemies; for he is “the true God, and Eternal Life.”—All the troubles of the church will soon be accomplished; and believers ere long will have done with captivity, punishment, sin, and sorrow: but the doom of their insulting enemies approaches; the Lord will soon bring their sins to light; he will put the cup of vengeance into their hands; and they shall drink it to the dregs, and lie down in eternal shame and sorrow. NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1—6. The title of this chapter in the Vulgate, and in some other versions, is 'The prayer of Jeremiah:' but no such title is found in the original; nor does it seem appropriate. It is an address to God, respecting the calamities of his people, as the improvement of the preceding representation of them. It consists of the same number of stanzas as the preceding chapters; but they are much shorter, and the alphabetical order is not observed.—A chorus of the Jews, or the collective body of the nation, is represented as calling on God to remember their miseries, and the reproach to which they were exposed. (Notes, ii. 20—22. Ps. lxxiv. 18—20. lxxix. Is. lxiii. 15—19. lxiv. Hos. xiv. 1—3.) The inheritance, which he had given to their fathers, and the houses which they had builded on it, were possessed by the Chaldeans, and other aliens from the nation of Israel: they were bereaved of their fathers, and their mothers were left destitute widows, amidst the oppressions of their enemies: they were forced, in the land of their captivity, to pay dear even for water and fuel, which they formerly had for fetching: they were grievously oppressed and persecuted, and laboured for their tyrants, without respite or refreshment: they had repeatedly been obliged to submit to the Egyptians and Assyrians, through their urgent necessities; and at last some of them were destitute strangers in Egypt, and others were captives in the regions formerly governed by the Assyrians. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, Is. xxx. 1—7. Jer. ii. 33—37, vv. 36, 37. Hos. v. 3, 14. vii. 11, 12. xiv. 1—3, v. 3.)

V. 7. The whole load of national guilt, which had been accumulating for ages, lay with incumbent weight on that generation of Israel: thus they bare the iniquities of their fathers, who were no more on earth, to suffer the temporal effects of their own transgressions. Of this they were at length made sensible; and that it was the cause of their extreme miseries, which they could not escape, but by a national repentance and conversion to God. It does not seem to have been spoken in a murmuring spirit; but as a humble acknowledgment of the justice of God, in his dealings with the nation. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Ex. xx. 5. Jer. xxxi. 29, 30. Ez. xviii. 2—4. Zech. i. 5, 6. Matt. xxiii. 34—39.)

Neh. v. 14—18. Prov. xxviii. 3.) Whilst the invasion of the land, and the siege of Jerusalem continued, and immediately after the city was taken, the people got their bread by hazarding their lives; for they were every where met with by their enemies, who destroyed them without mercy: and their skins were parched and turned black, by the extremity of the famine which they had endured. (Marg. Ref. n, o.—Note, iv. 7, 8.)

citizens,) were treated with indignity: their chosen strong men were enslaved, and employed in the hardest drudgery; and even the youths were loaded with wood till they fell under the burden. So that the elders no more appeared in the gate of the city, to administer justice, or to give counsel; the young men no more entertained themselves and others with musick. All their mirth was ceased and turned into mourning: all their honour was gone; their crown was fallen from their heads, and their miseries were come upon them because of their sins. (*Marg. V. 17, 18. The most distressful circumstance of all, to the pious remnant, was the desolation of Zion, which was become the resort of foxes, preying upon the dead bodies, which were there left unburied: since it was without temple, altar, or sacrifice; without priest, or worshipper, or inhabitant, to drive them away. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Ps. lli. 9—11, v. 10. lxxix. 1—5. Is. xxxii. 9—14.)

They besought him to convert them unto himself, by his renewing grace; (Marg. Ref. e.—Notes, Jer. xvii. 14. xxxi. 20;) that he might return to them in mercy, and renew those prosperous days, which their nation had anciently enjoyed: and they complained, that he had utterly rejected them in his anger; or rather they enquired, whether he meant thus to deal with them. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

In all troubles, prayer is our great duty and privilege, and the best means of relief: and all our sorrows should lead us to beseech the Lord to remember and help us. Though our sins and his just displeasure have caused our sufferings; yet we may hope in his pardoning mercy, his sanctifying grace, and his kind providence.—As wasting wars, terrible famines, and heavy oppressions, or persecutions, come upon nations, for the sins of former and present generations, when their appointed measure of iniquity is filled up; so the accumulating sins of a man's whole life will be punished with tremendous vengeance at last; except he obtain by faith an interest in Him, "who bare our sins in his own body on the tree."—The wrath of God turns the sinner's mirth into mourning, his liberty into bondage, and his honour into disgrace: "for this the crown is fallen from our heads, and woe unto us that we have sinned!" This first reduced the race of men to its present wretched condition; and the desolations of the church originate from the same source.—But though we should mourn over the miseries of the world, and the low estate of the church; yet the true Zion, to which believers are come, cannot be desolated, but remains for ever, even as the throne of our God in heaven. This inheritance cannot be forfeited or alienated: nor can our mansions be possessed by strangers; or our relation to God, as espoused and adopted into his family, abrogated; or "the liberty, wherewith Christ hath made us free," taken from us; the freeness of our salvation disannulled; or our joy and glorying in Christ made void. Various tribulations may make our hearts faint and our eyes dim; but our way to the mercy-seat of our reconciled God is still open: and we may beseech him not to forsake or forget us; and plead with him to turn and renew us, more and more, by his grace; that our hopes may revive, and our consolations abound, "as in the days of old." For the eternal and unchangeable God will not utterly reject his church, or any true believer, whatever our trials, fears, or lamentations may be. Let us then, 'in all our troubles, put our whole trust and confidence in his mercy;' let us confess our sins, and pour out our hearts before him; and let us watch against repinings or despondency, whatever we suffer, or whatever we witness of the troubles of our brethren; for this we surely know, that it shall be well in the event, with all who trust, fear, love, and serve God.

THE BOOK

PROPHET EZEKIEL.

EZEKIEL, like Jeremiah, was a priest as well as a prophet. He executed his office among the captives in Chaldea, during the latter part of the time that Jeremiah was employed at Jerusalem, and till some time after the destruction of the city.—He did not, however, reside at or near Babylon; but by the river Chebar, supposed by some to lie two hundred miles north of that city; where numbers of the captives were placed. (Note, i. 1—3.)—He seems to have been carried into captivity with Jehoiachin, and he dates his prophecies from that event: though he was not called to the prophetic office, till the fifth year after; and probably, in the thirtieth year of his age: though some reckon this thirtieth year, from Josiah's reformation, when he and Judah solemnly covenanted with God to be his people. (Note, i. 1—3, v. 2.) The scope of his predictions was very similar to that of Jeremiah; but his manner was exceedingly different: for he delivered his messages with a vehemence, energy, and even terror and severity, peculiar to himself, but very suitable to the subjects, and to the character of those among whom or concerning whom he prophesied. 'His style exactly answering the character the Greek rhetoricians give of that part of oratory they call Δεινωσις, which Quintilian defines to be, Oratio, quæ rebus asperis, indignis et invidiosis vim addit; ... its property being to aggravate things in themselves monstrous and odious, and represent them with great force and efficacy of expression. ... Rapin ... calls Ezekiel's style le terrible, as having 'something in it, that strikes the reader with an holy dread and astonishment.' Lowth. Yet he seems to have been especially raised up, to animate and encourage the pious remnant among the captives, with the hope of returning prosperity; and to convince them that their condition was greatly preferable to that of their brethren in Judah, against whom he predicted still more tremendous judgments, terminating in the desolations of the Temple, of Jerusalem, and of Judah; and almost the extermination of the inhabitants. (Notes, xi. 14—21.) The prophecies contained in this book, which have been most surprisingly fulfilled, and are fulfilling at this day, constitute a full demonstration, that Ezekiel "spoke as he was moved by the Holy Spirit;" especially his prophecies concerning Tyre and Egypt. (Notes, xxvi—xxxii.) It contains also many predictions, which are not yet fulfilled, relating to the restoration of Israel, and the triumphs of the church over all her enemies; which, on careful investigation, will be found entirely to coincide with many parts of Isaiah's and Daniel's prophecies, and with those contained in the revelation of St. John. (Notes, xxxvi—xxxix.)—There are also several evident references to it, in the New Testament, though it is not expressly quoted. (Compare i. x. with Rev. iv. v;—ix. 4. with Rev. vii. 2, 3;—and ix. 6. with 1 Pet. iv. 17.) Nor is there any doubt, that this prophecy formed a part of the sacred canon, in the days of our Lord and his apostles.—Some have observed, that the prophet's name was happily expressive of his character; as it may signify, the strength, or courage, of God.—Many parts of the book, however, are very figurative and obscure; and some, of which no solution, entirely satisfactory, seems to have been hitherto given.—It opens with an account of an emblematic vision of God, by which Ezekiel was called to the prophetic office. It then contains several visions, representing the calamities coming on the Jewish nation, and JEHOVAH's departure from his temple; connected with severe reproofs of the enormous wickedness of the Jews at Jerusalem, of the captives, and the whole nation with their kings, princes, priests, and prophets; and awful predictions against them. Having then predicted the judgments of God against the surrounding nations; the prophet changes his style, gives both Judah and Israel intimations of great mercies in reserve; and foretells the destruction of the enemies of the church and of Israel in the latter ages: and he concludes with a remarkable vision of the temple, city, and holy land; which, it is probable, is an emblematical description of the unity and prosperity of the church in the Millennium.—The whole prophecy is suited to fill the mind with solemn awe of the purity and justice of God, and hope in his mercy, and with dread and hatred of sin; to lead the thoughts to Christ and his kingdom; and to encourage our hopes of glorious final success to the cause of truth and holiness on earth.

NOTES

CHAP. I. V. 1—3. Some interpreters compute this “thirtieth year,” from the reformation in the reign of Josiah; when a new Æra commenced, and another trial was made of the kingdom of Judah. Others compute it from the accession of Nabopolassar to the throne of Babylon, which formed a new Æra to the Chaldeans, coincident with that of Josiah’s reformation: but others think that the prophet only meant that he was thirty years of age, before he was called to his important office.—This was in the fifth year of Jehoiachin’s captivity, with whom Ezekiel seems to have been carried away; and consequently it was in the fifth year of Zedekiah’s reign, about six years before the final desolations of Jerusalem. (Marg. Ref. f.—Notes, 2 Kings xxiv. 8—20.) The captive Jews seem to have been left some time without prophets, or visions from God, who might supply the want of the more ordinary means of instruction; (Note, Lam. ii. 9:) but at length the Lord raised them up a prophet in their captivity.—Ezekiel was among the other captives by the river Chebar; where they might be stationed by the victors to cultivate waste lands, or to carry on some manufacture for their benefit. (Marg. Ref. c.) ‘The king of Babylon planted his Jewish captives at Telabib,’ (iii. 15,) ‘and other places on the river Chebar, which flows into the east side of the Euphrates, at Circesium, or Carchemish, near two hundred miles northward of Babylon. ... Ammiarus calls this river Aboras, and Ptolemy, Chaboras.’ Bp. Newcombe. Michaelis. Here Ezekiel saw “the heavens opened;” and the extraordinary appearance of the firmament made way for the visions of the God of Israel. Marg. Ref. d, e.—Notes, Matt. iii. 16, 17. Acts vii. 54—60, v. 55, 56. Rev. iv. 1—3. xix. 11—16, v. 11.) Thus “the word of the LORD came to him expressly,” with clearness and conviction; so that he could neither doubt of its divine authority, mistake its import, or question his appointment to the prophetic office. Some suppose, that the personal Word or Son of God, came and spake to him, in a distinct and audible voice, as doubtless he afterwards did. (Notes, 26—28. ii. 1, 2.)—This revelation was accompanied with “the hand of the LORD upon him;” a divine power thus overcoming his reluctance to the arduous work, encouraging him to enter on it, and qualifying him for it. Or it may denote that he was so impressed by the power of God, as to have his senses closed to external objects, and his mind prepared to contemplate the heavenly visions. (Marg. Ref. g, h.)

V. 4. The prophet, having fixed his attention on the objects presented to his view, first “saw a whirlwind come out of the north:” this might denote the impetuous destruction, which from Babylon was about to overwhelm Jerusalem and Judah. (Marg. Ref. i.—Notes, Jer. i. 13, 14. xxiii. 19, 20.) This whirlwind brought with it “a great cloud;” an emblem of the darkness of the Lord’s dispensations, and of the heavy judgments which impended over the Jewish nation. Along with this, was “a fire infolding itself,” or kindling itself, or burning incessantly: (Marg. and Marg. Ref. k:) this might represent the justice and holiness of God, and the awful vengeance which he was about to execute, for the glory of his perfections, and from motives taken from himself, and centring in himself. The whirlwind, the cloud, and the fire, were similar to the tremendous appearances from mount Sinai, at the giving of the law; and intimated that the same glorious God was about to come, and inflict condign punishment on the transgressors of it. (Notes, Ex. xix. 16—20. 2 Sam. xxii. 7—16. 1 Kings xix. 11—14. Hab. iii. 9, 10. Heb. xii. 18—21.) This fire diffused a brightness round about it; and from the midst of it was seen as “the colour of amber,” or, as some explain it, of a polished mixed metal; which might signify, that there is light enough afforded to discern something of the divine counsels and operations; and that, as far as we can understand them, they appear very splendid and glorious.—‘Out of the midst of the fiery splendour, there was, as it were, a shining colour of amber, to signify the presence of God’s powerful grace and mercy, in the midst of the fiery trials of his church.’ Bp. Hall. (Marg. Ref. l.—Note, Rev. i. 12—20.)

V. 5—14. Out of the midst of the glorious vision, the prophet saw “the likeness of four living creatures.” These seem to have been emblems, or a hieroglyphical representation, of the holy angels, the attendants on “the King of glory,” and the ministers of his providence.

They were "four;" probably to denote, that they were employed in all the four quarters of the world, or to the four winds of heaven. Their appearance, in "the likeness of a man," denoted that they were intelligent and rational creatures, of which that form is to us the token. But each of them had "four faces," which seem to be emblematic of their endowments and characters. "The face of a man" implied, that they possessed knowledge, foresight, prudence, compassion, and philanthropy ; that of "a lion," intimated their boldness and force, in executing the will of God ; that of "an ox," denoted strength, unwearied diligence, and perseverance ; and that of "an eagle," spiritual sagacity and heavenly affections, by which they soared aloft above all created objects, to the uncreated Source of holiness and felicity. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. m—a, Notes, x. 9—12. 14. 20—22.)—Compare Rev. iv. 6, where our translation ... renders the word 'Ζῷα, beasts, whereas it should be rendered living creatures; the better to distinguish them from the antichristian beast, always expressed in that book by Θῦριον. ... In that text the four living creatures denote some part of the Christian church, as appears by comparing that place with Rev. v. 8, 9. Lowth.—Indeed it seems capable of full proof, that the ministers of the gospel are thus hieroglyphically described by the apostle ; (Notes, Rev. iv. 6—8. v. 8—10;) and this being evident, some learned men have concluded, probably on insufficient grounds, that Ezekiel's vision had a similar meaning. (Note, x. 1, 2.) But the four faces, which each of these living creatures had, are divided, one to each, among the living creatures which the apostle saw : and this difference may imply, that the endowments, which are divided in various proportions among the wisest and holiest men on earth, are all conjoined in the holy angels.—These living creatures were also represented with "four wings each;" being emblematic of the activity and celerity, with which they executed the divine mandates : as their "hands under their wings" were of their skilfulness or dexterity in all their services, of which at the same time they made no ostentation : 'The hand being peculiar to mankind, among all living creatures, and the chief instrument of all artificial operations.'

Lowth. Their wings being joined together, might denote the perfect unanimity which prevails among them ; and their "going straight forward without turning," their steadiness and constancy in obedience.—'They needed not to turn their bodies, that their faces might stand the way they were to go ; for go which way they would, they had a face that looked that way. This signifies that nothing ever diverted them from fulfilling God's commands.' Lowth.—'Their proceeding directly on, in the same undeviating position, seems to shew their steadiness in performing the divine will, which advances to its destined goal right onward.' Bp. Newcombe.—Their wings, "stretched upward," represented their promptitude to execute their Maker's orders ; as those with which they "covered their bodies," did their conscious imperfection and meanness in his glorious presence. Their "straight feet" might be emblematic of simplicity and uprightness ; as the sole of their feet, divided like that of the calf (7), or other clean animals, might be of their perfect purity and holiness : and their "sparkling like the colour of burnished brass" seems to represent their superior excellency and dignity. They were also represented as going "whither the Spirit was to go ;" which might signify the subserviency of their ministrations in the providential government of the world, to the great concerns of religion, and the prosperity of the church. Their appearance was "like burning coals of fire, and the appearance of lamps ;" which might denote their ardent zeal and love, connected with equal knowledge and wisdom. The lamps, or light, "going up and down among the living creatures," might intimate, that the Fountain of Light communicated to them severally, as he pleased : and the bright fire issuing forth, as lightning, might be an emblem of the terrible effects of their ministry, on the objects of the divine vengeance ; or it might signify the same, as their "running and returning as a flash of lightning," with inexpressible velocity. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. b—g.)—Each of the seraphim in Isaiah, (Note, Is. vi. 1—4,) had six wings ; and so had the living creatures, seen by the apostle : but those seen by Ezekiel had but four.—'The Seraphim in these texts make use of two of their wings to cover their faces, ou

V. 15—25. As the living creatures were emblems of the hosts of angels, ministering to the God of Israel; so these wheels denote the mysterious dispensations of his providence. These are as the wheels of a chariot, in which JEHOVAH rides to execute the purposes of his own will; and by them his presence and power are manifested in every place. (Marg. Ref. h.—Notes, Dan. vii. 9—12, v. 9.) The shape of wheels, and their aptitude for continual motion, represent the constant revolutions of human affairs, under the conduct of Providence. Those persons or communities, which to-day are at the top of the wheel, may to-morrow be at the bottom, beyond all human expectation or prevention: yet in the midst of apparent confusion, and whilst every thing seems hurried on by blind chance, a fatal necessity; the most perfect regularity is observed, and the changes are directed by as fixed laws, as those which regulate the motion of wheels.—'The wheels are supposed to express the revolutions of God's providence; which are regular, though they appear intricate.' Bp. Lowcombe. (Marg. Ref. i—m.)—Whilst the prophet was contemplating the living creatures, he saw, "upon the earth," (to denote that the vision related to the affairs of this lower world,) "one wheel," that is, by each of them, be the four wheels of a chariot. The appearance and work of the wheels was like unto the colour of a beryl; the wisdom, justice, truth, and goodness of God's providential government, might be denoted by the exquisite workmanship and beautiful colour of the wheels. The colour here intended is supposed to have been the green of the seawater; which some think an emblem of the perpetual vicissitudes of human affairs; as the ocean is sometimes agitated by furious storms, and then sinks into a calm. The four wheels were all formed alike; for there is a consistency, and even uniformity, in the dispensations of Providence. But there was also, "as it were, a wheel in the middle of "a wheel;" perhaps a smaller wheel connected with the larger, and put in motion by it; an emblem of the connexion of causes and effects, with great apparent intricacy and almost endless variety, which are governed by the sovereign will of God. Or, by one wheel passing through another of the same size, at right angles, provision was made, that nothing could interrupt or retard their progress.—So that when the wheels moved, they went on "their four sides;" or moved steadily in their proper places, without deviating or being diverted from their course by any impediments. 'They never went backward, (x. 11,) to signify that Providence doeth nothing in vain, but always accomplishes its end. ... Is. lv. 11.' Lowth. The rings (marg.) of the wheels were so high, and their circumference was so immense, that they were dreadful to look upon: an emblem of the vast designs of Providence, full of incomprehensible mysteries to be humbly adored by us, and involving many terrible judgments on the workers of wickedness. (Marg. Ref. m, n.—Notes, Job xxvi. 14. Ps. xxvii. 2—7, v. 3. Dan. iv. 34—37. Rom. xi. 33—36.) But these rings were "full of eyes round about;" which signified, that infinite knowledge and wisdom ordered every dispensation, and that the purposes of God could not be disappointed by any unforeseen conjuncture. As “the living creatures went whither the Spirit was to go,” so the wheels followed the living creatures; for the same Spirit actuated both the living creatures and the wheels: and though the wheels were at first seen on the earth, they often were lifted up above it; all which might signify, that the dispensations of God on earth are connected with heavenly things, and are all appointed in subordination to the concerns of his church.—The firmament, over the heads of the living creatures, was as the colour of the terrible crystal: (or, as some render the word, ice;) at once clear, splendid, and magnificent; and suited to impress the mind with solemn awe and terror. ‘By the “terrible crystal” is meant such as dazzles the eyes with it’s lustre.’ Lowth. This might also denote that the ministry of the angels was entirely subordinate, and infinitely inferior, to the majesty and power of God.—Whilst under this firmament the living creatures executed their commissions, the noise of their motion resembled that of the rushing of mighty waters, or of tremendous thunders, (called here “the voice of the Almighty,”) or of the shout of an army; which may give us an idea of the number and power of these ministering spirits. But when they had executed their commissions, and let down their wings, a voice was heard from the firmament; perhaps denoting the divine approbation of their services, or the communication of further orders. (Marg. and Murg. Ref. o—z.—Notes, ix. 3, 4. x. 1—7. 9—13. 18, 19. xi. 22—25. Gen. xxiv. 2—9, v. 9. Ps. ciii. 20—22.)

V. 26—28. The emblems of the attendants and providential appointments of Israel’s God having been shewn, some glimpses of his divine glory are here given; but they are even more abstruse, than what has been already considered. Probably, the Lord intentionally left these emblematic or hieroglyphical discoveries of himself and of his works so obscure and intricate, in order that whilst they suggested the intended instruction, they might not be capable of being delineated by the painter, or induce the statuary to attempt a similitude of them; though some have absurdly done so. There appeared to the prophet, not a real throne, but “the likeness of a throne;” an emblem of the sovereign authority of JEHOVAH over all creatures, over the world and the church: and it was “as the appearance of a sapphire-stone;” that is, it was exquisite in beauty and splendour. Upon this “likeness of a throne,” “was the likeness as the appearance of a man,” or Adam; which evidently denoted the eternal Son, the second person in the sacred Trinity, who afterwards assumed human nature, “the second Adam, the Lord from heaven,” who before, “in the form of God,” was Israel’s king. (Marg. Ref. b—h.—Notes, Ex. xxiv. 9—11. Is. vi. 1—4. 1 Cor. xv. 45—49.) The appearance “of amber and of fire” round “about the throne,” and within it, and in every part of his manifested presence; being connected with the rainbow, a well known emblem of the covenant of grace; represented his mercy and covenanted love to his people, as harmonizing with his awful justice and holiness; and shewed that he administered all the affairs of his kingdom with reference to his new covenant. (Notes, Gen. ix. 9—17. Is. liv. 6—10. Rev. iv. 1—3. x. 1.)—‘We may certainly conclude, that this was the appearance of the “second person of the blessed Trinity;... because he appears under the resemblance of a Man. ...The light reflected from this vision had the appearance of a rainbow, a token of God’s covenant of mercy;... to denote that God, in the midst of judgment, would remember mercy, and not utterly destroy his people. (Rev. iv. 3.)—Especially this vision, being an evident representation of the “Word” “that was” to be “made flesh,” whose incarnation is the foundation of God’s covenant of mercy with mankind; and rainbow, the symbol and token of mercy, was a very fit attendant. Rev. x. 1.’ Lowth.—When the prophet saw this likeness of the glory of the Lord, he fell prostrate before it in adoration, and humble consciousness of his unworthiness. (Marg. Ref. i—l.—Notes, viii. 2—4, v. 2. Joel xlii. 1—6. Is. vi. 5. Dan. viii. 15—19. x. 15—19. Rev. i. 12—20, v. 17.)—The whole of this introductory vision when reported to the people, was suited to impress their minds also with solemn awe and fear of the divine displeasure; and yet to raise their expectations of blessings from their glorious Lord and King.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14.

When the ministers and ordinances of God have been despised and abused, he will sometimes render them precious by scarcity: but he will never leave his people entirely destitute of instruction or encouragement. They are as dear to him in captivity, in poverty, and under severe oppression, as when more prosperous. Outward circumstances cannot preclude them from his gracious manifestations: and his providence and grace will concur in qualifying them for the services for which they are intended, and in calling them forth to them.—We are reminded of the incomprehensible majesty of JEHOVAH, and of his infinite perfections, in all the discoveries which he has made

CHAP. II.

Ezekiel receives his commission and instructions, as a prophet to rebellious Israel, 1—5. He is warned neither to fear them, nor to imitate their rebellion, 6—8. He receives a roll, full of “lamentations, and “mourning, and woe,” 9, 10.

himself. The humble and attentive believer may understand enough, to impress his mind with solemn awe, and to inspire filial confidence: but he must perceive such depths in every subject relative to the infinite and eternal God, and his perfections, purposes, and dispensations, as serve to teach him humility and adoration. Thus we may learn profitable lessons even from those representations, of which we can understand but little: for we may be reminded, that “clouds and darkness are round about” our God, while “judgment and justice are the basis of his throne.” “A consuming fire goeth before him, and it is very tempestuous round about him;” not only when he speaks from mount Sinai, but even when he shews his glory from mount Zion, as the God and Father of his people. Light enough is afforded us to discover, that he does all in wisdom, truth, justice, and goodness: but who can declare the depths of his counsels and operations? Let us then attend to those things, which relate to our peace and duty; and leave secret things to the Lord, to whom alone they belong. (Note, Deut. xxix. 29.) By faith we may behold him surrounded with “an innumerable company of angels,” who excel in wisdom and strength, and in all created and communicable perfections: and whilst we contemplate the discoveries of their character and services; we should pray to be made like them here, as we hope hereafter to be equal to them. We should study and copy the wisdom, zeal, alacrity, and diligence, by which they are constantly actuated and directed: and though we cannot reach the exalted strains of their worship, or the perfection of their services; though we have not their wings, but are clogged by these “vile bodies,” and unable to mount with their rapid flight, or obey with their celerity: (Note, Phil. iii. 20, 21:) yet we may labour with patience and constancy; we may fill up our stations with intelligence and skill; we may go about our work with boldness, and not fear the frown or wrath of man; we may “set our affections on heavenly things,” and cultivate harmony and love with our brethren and fellow servants; we may go straight forward, undiverted from our path by the smiles or frowns of the world; we may be “clothed with humility,” and “serve the LORD with gladness;” we may “exercise ourselves to have a conscience void of offence towards God and man;” and simply give up ourselves to be disposed of, employed, and guided by his Spirit, according to his revealed will, without preferring our own inclinations, secular interests, or honour, to his glory. These things, by the grace of God, may be attained in some good measure here on earth: and then a blessed change may be expected; when sin shall be done away for ever, when our bodies will be made spiritual, and we may emulate with success the worship and services of these blessed spirits before the throne, “who run and return like a flash of lightning.” At present, we should consider them as the ministers of providence, both in justice and mercy; especially as “sent forth to minister unto the heirs of salvation,” who owe numberless deliverances to their condescending and watchful care. (Note, Heb. i. 13, 14.) While this should instruct us to imitate their conduct, in our attention to our poor and afflicted brethren; it should endear them to us, though unseen, and make us long for that time when we shall join their blissful society.

While we aim to know and fill up our proper place, in the church and in the community, and to serve our generation with cheerful diligence; let us be satisfied with being informed in general, that the Lord guides the wheels of providence, as well as those of nature: amidst all the apparent intricacies and unnumbered vicissitudes, the whole is directed with an unerring hand: and, whether at the top or at the bottom of the wheel, our place is assigned by him, and for our good, if we be indeed his people. Nor need we despond in the lowest scenes of adversity; for the wheels keep turning round, and will raise us again in due time from our depression: whilst they, who presume upon prosperity, know not how soon they may be cast down.—The dispensations of Providence are ordered under the influence of that Spirit, who sanctifies the church, and dwells in the heart of every believer. If then the immense and complicated designs of omnipotent wisdom dismay and perplex us; if the view of the Lord’s awful power and justice alarm us; let us look to him, who fills the mediatorial throne, and rules over all worlds, and who shall soon appear on the judgment-seat. And considering that he dwells in our nature, and is our Brother and our Friend; and that he administers all things in subserviency to that everlasting covenant, the blessings of which he purchased with his blood; we may resume our confidence, and possess a cheerful hope tempering our “reverence and godly fear.” That “covenant is ordered in all things and sure,” and like its great Surety, is “the same yesterday, to-day, and “for ever:” (Notes, 2 Sam. xxiii. 5. Is. lv. 1—3. Heb. xiii. 7, 8. 20, 21:) and though the voice of the Almighty is in itself terrible to us sinful creatures; yet it is most encouraging from the gracious lips of his “well-beloved “Son.” “The light of the glory of our God” is here more distinctly viewed, as it appears in softened lustre: here we see “a just God and a Saviour;” “a consuming “Fire” to obstinate transgressors, but a most faithful Friend to all who flee to him for refuge. Let sinners then throng to him, and prostrate themselves before him, on his throne of grace, encouraged by his love, while awed by his majesty, justice, and power: and then they will not tremble when he shall appear on his great tribunal. And let believers more and more contemplate his glory, that they may be gradually “changed into his image, by the Spirit “of the Lord.” (Notes, 2 Cor. iii. 17, 18. iv. 3—6.)

“man;” (Dan. viii. 17;) but Ezekiel is the only prophet, who is generally thus addressed. He had been admitted, as it were, to the society of the spirits before the throne: but this must not cause him to forget, that he was a son of man, a child of Adam, a sinful, frail, and dying creature; though the Lord was pleased to send him to his people, rather than any of the holy angels who ministered before him.—As Christ commonly called himself, and was often called by others, “The Son of Man,” the title may also be considered as an honourable distinction. (Marg. Ref. a.—Notes, Ps. lxxx. 17, 18. cxlvi. 3, 4.) It was indeed the Redeemer’s lowest style, as he is also “the Son of God:” yet it was a peculiar honour to him to be the chief of all the sons of Adam, and the only one who was free from sin, and well pleasing to God on his own account. And, though this was not the case with Ezekiel, yet he was highly favoured, in being admitted to these visions of God, and employed in the prophetic office, while the nation and the priestly family were in great affliction and disgrace.—When he lay prostrate in an adoring posture upon the earth, he was not so well prepared to receive and execute the divine mandates: he was therefore ordered to arise and stand on his feet; and the Spirit of prophecy, communicated to him, encouraged and enabled him so to do. (Marg. Ref. b, c.—Notes, i. 26—28. iii. 12—15. 22—27. Dan. x. 4—19, vv. 7—9. Matt. xvii. 5—8.)

V. 3—5. The Lord, appearing in vision “in the likeness of the appearance of a man,” (i. 26,) commissioned the prophet to go in his name to the house of Israel. His personal ministry was confined to the captives in Chaldea: but the Jews in their own land, and the dispersed Israelites were included in his commission; many of his predictions and reproofs related to them, and his writings would reach them: and though he delivered prophecies concerning other nations, yet they all had some reference to the nations of Israel and Judah. The original is, “rebellious nations :” thus God described them; for from generation to generation they had continued to rebel against him, and were still disposed to do the same. They were a shameless, daring, and hardened race of obstinate transgressors; “impudent in their countenances and hardened in their hearts.” (Marg. and Marg. Ref. e—g.—Notes, Is. xlviii. 3—5, v. 4. Jer. iii. 2, 3, v. 3. vi. 13—15.) Yet they must not be wholly given up, being favoured for their fathers’ sake, and because of the Messiah who was to be raised up among them. (Notes, Is. vi. 8. 13. lxxv. 8—10. Matt. xxiv. 21, 22. Rom. xi. 25—32.) A few might be better disposed; others, especially of the rising generation, might be reclaimed, and the rest would be left without excuse. The prophet was therefore to go to them, and to preface his message, with, “Thus saith the Lord God.” (ADONAI JEHOVAH.) And whether they would or would not regard his message; (for they were so rebellious, that he might expect many of them to treat it with contempt;) yet they would know by the event, that a prophet had been sent to them, for his predictions would assuredly be verified.—‘The event answering thy predictions, shall render thy authority unquestionable, and them inexcusable for not hearkening to thy warnings.’ Lowth. (Marg. Ref. h, i.—Note, xxxiii. 30—33, v. 33.)

A rebellious nation. (3) ‘The Hebrew word is Goïm, nations; the word which is commonly used to denote the heathens, intimating that the Jews had outdone the wickedness of the heathens. (v. 5, 6.)’ Lowth.

V. 6. The prophet was here warned to arm himself with courage and patience: for he must expect ill-treatment from the rebels, if he faithfully stood up for the authority, law, truth, and glory of God. They were in themselves worthless and noxious as “thorns and briers;” yea, venomous and malignant as “scorpions:” and their company would be uneasy to him, as the thorns and briers, which tear the flesh of those who fall down among them, or endeavour to pass through them; nay, they would attempt to destroy him as scorpions. And even their menacing words and looks would intimidate and silence him, except he were upheld by faith and the fear of God.—‘The prophets and messengers of God are often exhorted to take courage, ... without fearing any man’s person, or standing in awe of any man’s greatness. (iii. 8, 9. Jer. i. 8. 18. Matt. x. 28.) Such a presence of mind is expressed by παρρησία boldness in the New Testament. ... And they have need of great presence of mind, who are to reprove men hardened in sin, who are always impatient of reproof, and become the enemies of those who tell them such truths as they have no mind to hear.’ Lowth. (*Marg. V. 7, 8. (Note, 3—5.) The prophet would be especially tempted to decline his work, or to “shun to declare unto them, whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear; for they are

“the whole counsel of God,” before such obstinate rebels and malignant and furious opposers. Probably, at this very time he was unwilling to undertake a service, which appeared so perilous and discouraging. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. n, o.—Note, iii. 12—15.) But the Lord shewed him, that his refusal or unfaithfulness would rank him also among the rebels; and warned him not to imitate their perverse conduct. He was therefore ordered to open his mouth, and eat the roll which would be given him: that is, he must receive, study, and digest it in his mind; that he might be prepared to speak the contents of it to the people, without fear or hesitation. (Marg. Ref. p.—Notes, iii. 1—3. Job xxiii. 8—12. Jer. xv. 15—18. Rev. x. 8—11.)

V. 9, 10. While these words were speaking, the prophet saw a hand sent to him, no doubt, from the divine person, whom he had before seen in vision. (Note, i. 26—28.) The hand had in it a roll of parchment, or of such other materials as were then used to write upon: and the roll being opened before him, he saw it every where written with “lamentations, and mourning, and woe.” This shewed the heavy judgments, which he would have to denounce against his rebellious people; the performance of which would cause them to lament and mourn, and would render them most miserable.—‘The ancient books were rolled on cylinders of wood, or ivory; and usually the writing was only on the inside.’ Bp. Newcombe. (Marg. Ref.—Note, Rev. v. 1—4.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We should hearken to the word of God, with a full purpose of yielding a prompt obedience to it. When he calls the sinner to awake, arise, and attend to the concerns of his soul, to repent, and be converted, and believe the gospel; the Spirit of life and grace accompanies the call, and as it were sets him on his feet, and enables him to do that indeed before was his duty, but which he had neither will nor power to perform. The same blessed influence must be depended on by ministers and Christians, in every service to which they are called.—Human depravity never appears so great, as in the impudent, daring, obstinate, and atrocious wickedness of those, who have been most favoured with the means of grace. Yet the Lord will not forsake his church, though multitudes of such “rebellious children” have in every age infested it. He knows how to

Ezekiel, being made to eat the roll, finds it very sweet, 1—3. God encourages him for the work assigned him, and warns him to be faithful, 4—11. He is carried by the Spirit, in great bitterness, to the captive Jews, and remains with them seven days, 12—15. He is shewn his duty and responsibility, as a watchman to Israel, 16—21. He is ordered to shut himself up; and is further instructed concerning the hardships which awaited him, and the shutting and opening of his mouth, 22—27.

discriminate between “the precious and the vile,” and to estimate the degree of men’s rebellion: and he often sends his ministers to those, who he foresees will not regard their word. But whilst they warn and “rebuke with all authority” in his name, he will be glorified and they will be accepted, “whether men will hear or whether they will forbear:” (Note, 2 Cor. ii. 14—17:) and those who have most despised the word of God when faithfully preached, will know, when condemned for neglecting so great salvation, that a prophet has been among them.—The more outrageous and insolent sinners are in wickedness, the more bold and faithful must ministers be in addressing them. They cannot please men and serve Christ: (Note, and P. O. Gal. i. 6—10. Note, 1 Thes. ii. 1—8:) they must be armed with that mind which was in him, that they may be prepared to endure hardship and to bear the cross: they must expect to be harassed by briars and thorns, if not to “dwell with scorpions;” and it would be vain to look for ease, comfort, or safety, in such a situation, except from the Lord. They must not then fear the proud looks, or blustering words, the mockings, revilings, or menaces, of powerful rebels: but must trust in God’s protection, speak his words, and fear nothing but being numbered by him among the rebels; or being seduced or terrified to copy or countenance their ungodliness: and they must diligently hear the words of God, and meditate on them continually, that they may be earnest in their work, and well qualified for it.—Those who are most acquainted with the scripture, will most clearly perceive, that it is every where filled with “lamentations, and mourning, and woe” to impenitent sinners, whether infidels, profligates, self-righteous moralists and formalists, or hypocrites; and that all the grace and precious promises of the gospel will eventually be fulfilled to the penitent, believing, and obedient servants of God, and to them alone.

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1—3. The Lord Christ, the eternal Word, from his throne, here continued to speak to his prophet. (Note, i. 26—28.) He ordered him to “eat what he found;” that is, to receive into his mind and heart the revelations made to him, without objecting to any part of them. He was to receive the truths of God as the food of his soul, and to feed upon them by faith, and with

7 But the house of Israel ⁱ will not hearken unto thee, for they will not hearken unto me; for ^k all the house of Israel are [†] impudent and hard-hearted.

8 Behold, ^l I have made thy face strong against their faces, and thy forehead strong against their foreheads.

9 As an ^m adamant harder than flint have I made thy forehead: ⁿ fear them not, neither be dismayed at their looks, though they be a rebellious house.

10 Moreover he said unto me, Son of man, all my words that I shall speak unto thee ^o receive in thine heart, and hear with thine ears.

11 And go, ^p get thee to them of the captivity, unto ^q the children of thy people, and ^r speak unto them, and tell them, Thus saith the Lord God; whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear.

12 ¶ Then ^s the Spirit took me up, and I heard behind me ^t a voice of a a spiritual relish; and whatever he thus found, would prove wholesome and nutrimental: especially he must thus receive the roll given to him, containing the predictions which he was sent to deliver to Israel. (Note, ii. 9, 10.) And when he had eaten the roll of the book, he was ordered to go and speak to the house of Israel. Accordingly he opened his mouth, and the Lord fed him with the roll; as an emblem that he communicates his truth to all, whose hearts are prepared to receive it.—He must also meditate on every part of this roll, that his judgment might be formed on it, his memory stored with it, and his affections regulated by it; as the stomach digests, and the bowels assimilate, the food for the nourishment of our bodies. (Note, Col. iii. 16, 17, v. 16.) Accordingly he did so; and the roll, though “written within and without, ... lamentations, and mourning, and woe,” was in his “mouth as honey for sweetness.” (Marg. Ref. e, f.) The revelation of future events, and the meditation on the truths of God’s word, were very pleasant; and perhaps the first thoughts of being honoured as a prophet were agreeable. ‘I... was pleased with the hopes of being the instrument of their conversion, and the amendment of some of them.’ Lowth. But when he afterwards considered what predictions and denunciations he was commissioned to deliver to the people; that these would increase their condemnation; and that he would be hated and persecuted on this account; his spirit was much embittered. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. on 14.—Note, Rev. x. 8—11.)

V. 4—11. The prophet seems to have been very reluctant to the service allotted him, (Notes, Jer. xx. 7—9. Jon. i. 2, 3,) and therefore he was repeatedly urged to it. He was not, however, sent (as Jonah had been,) to Nineveh, or to any of the surrounding nations, whose language not being understood by him, would have appeared strange and uncouth; nor could he have conversed with them but by an interpreter: (Marg. and Marg. Ref. g, h. Notes, Deut. xxviii. 49—57, v. 49. Is. xxxiii. 17—19. 1 Cor. xiv. 20—25 :) but he was sent to his own people, even the nation of Israel. Yet had he gone to any of the nations, who were strangers to the language and religion of Israel, they would have been better disposed to attend to him: their hearts were not so hard, nor their consciences so seared, as those of Israel were become, by continually sinning against convictions, and abusing their peculiar advantages; and therefore they would have been more susceptible of terror or shame. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Matt. v. 13. xi. 20—24. xii. 41, 42.) But the Israelites would not hearken to the prophet, for they would not hearken to the Lord himself, being almost universally impudent, and hardened in their impiety. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 1 Sam. viii. 6—9. John xv. 17—21.)—At the same time that God informed Ezekiel of the ill success of his ministry; he assured him that he had prepared him, or would qualify him, to encounter opposition, by giving him abundant intrepidity and firmness: so that with dauntless courage he should be enabled to oppose and reprove their sins; insomuch that their frowns and menaces should make no more impression on him, than on an adamant or diamond, which is harder than a flint. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. k—n.—Notes, ii. 3—8. Is. i. 7—9, v. 7.) And therefore, depending on this promise of support in the hour of trial, he ought to dismiss his present fears: and, having heard and well understood all the words which God sent him to speak; he must go immediately to his captive brethren, and declare them with all plainness and authority. (Marg. Ref. o, p. r.) ‘He sheweth (10) what is meant by eating the book; which is, that the ministers of God may speak nothing of themselves, but that only which they have received of the Lord.’

V. 12—15. As the prophet still shewed a reluctance to great rushing, saying, "Blessed be the glory of the LORD from his place." 13 I heard also the noise of the wings of the living creatures that touched one another, and the noise of the wheels over against them, and a noise of a great rushing.

14 So the Spirit lifted me up, and took me away, and I went in bitterness, in the heat of my spirit; but the hand of the LORD was strong upon me.

15 Then I came to them of the captivity at Tel-abib, that dwelt by the river of Chebar, and I sat where they sat, and remained there astonished among them seven days.

16 ¶ And it came to pass at the end of seven days, that the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,

17 Son of man, I have made thee a watchman unto the house of Israel: therefore hear the word at my mouth, and give them warning from me.

18 When I say unto the wicked, Thou shalt surely die; and thou givest him not warning, nor speakest to warn the wicked from his wicked way, to save his life; the same wicked man shall die in his iniquity, but his blood will I require at thine hand.

19 Yet if thou warn the wicked, and he turn not from his wickedness, nor from his wicked way, he shall die in his iniquity; but thou hast delivered thy soul.

his work, he was supernaturally apprehended by the Spirit of prophecy, and conveyed to the persons to whom he was to deliver his message; (Notes, viii. 1. xi. 22—25. 1 Kings xviii. 12—16. 2 Kings ii. 16—18. Acts viii. 36—40. 2 Cor. ii. 1—6;) and, the visions still continuing, he heard, as he was departing, "the voice of a great rushing." This some suppose to have been an emblem of the great commotions, which he was about to predict. It, however, proceeded from the living creatures, the hosts of angels; who, at the same time, "blessed the glory of the LORD from his place:" or adored the displays of his glory, in all these dispensations and appointments. (Marg. Ref. t, u.—Notes, Is. vi. 1—4. Rev. v. 11—14.)—"The words imply, that though God should forsake his temple, (ix. 3,) and destroy the place that is called by his name; yet his presence will make a temple of every place, and multitudes of the heavenly host will always be ready to do him service." Lowth. "By us his ministering spirits, who are now in the place where his honour dwelleth." Bp. Newcombe. (Note, Hos. v. 15.)—The noise of the wings of the living creatures, which touched each other, and the noise of the wheels, intimated that the unanimous ministrations of angels, and the dispensations of Providence would concur with the predictions of the prophet. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. y, z.—Notes, i. 5—14, vv. 8, 9. 15—25.)—Thus he was lifted up and taken away: but he went in great bitterness and heat of his spirit. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. a, b.—Notes, Num. xi. 11—15. 1 Kings xix. 3, 4. Jer. xx. 14—18. Jon. iv. 1—11.) The joy which he first experienced in receiving the divine message, was quickly turned into anguish and dismay, at the prospect of those calamities which were coming on his people; and probably because of the opposition which he had to encounter. But he was unable to withstand the divine power, which constrained him to proceed. Then he came to the captives at Tel-abib. "These seem to be a distinct colony from those that are mentioned i. 3." Lowth. Here he continued seven days among the captives, without delivering his message, either making observations on their conduct, or, as some think, waiting for the sabbath, as the best time to speak to them. But he was filled with terror and astonishment at what he had seen and heard. (Marg. Ref. c, d.—Notes, Jer. xxiii. 9—12, v. 9. Dan. iv. 19. vii. 15—18, v. 15. x. 4—9, vv. 8, 9. 15—19. Hab. iii. 16.)

V. 17—19. For the admonition and encouragement, as well as the instruction of the prophet; that he might understand the nature of his office, and the indispensable necessity of faithfully performing it; the Lord expressly declared that he had appointed him "a watchman to the house of Israel." (Marg. Ref. e, f.—Notes, Cant. iii. 1—5, v. 3. Is. lii. 7, 8. lvi. 9—12. lxii. 6, 7. Jer. vi. 16, 17. xxxi. 6, 7. Hab. ii. 1—3. Heb. xiii. 17.)—The watchmen were stationed to keep a constant look out, that they might discern enemies or dangers at a distance, and warn the people to avoid or repel them: but if they neglected to watch, or to give warning, they would be chargeable with the murder of such as perished through their negligence. (Notes, Is. xxi. 6—12.) In like manner, a centinel in the army, though often exposed to danger from the enemy, is in greater danger from his commander, if he desert his post or do not attend to his duty. But if the watchman gave notice of the approaching danger, and the people neglected to profit by the warning; they might indeed be cut off, but he would be guiltless. Thus the Lord had appointed the prophet to observe and to report to his people, the dangers to which their sins exposed them: this he was required to do, by hearing the word of the Lord, and "warning them from him." And if he did not fairly report to the wicked the sentence of death and destruction, which the Lord had passed upon them; solemnly warning them to repent and turn from their wicked ways, that they might save their lives; they would then be cut off by divine judgments in their sins, and the prophet would be condemned as their murderer. But if he gave the wicked full warning, and they still went on in their sins and perished; he would be free from guilt, and not be considered as accessory to their ruin. So that there were sufficient reasons, why he should be very faithful and courageous, though exposed to much contempt and persecution, and apparently unsuccessful; as this would be the only way, and the sure way, in which he might avoid being involved in the guilt and ruin of his people. Ref. q.—Notes, Is. viii. 11—15. Jer. vi. 21. Matt. vi. 13. xiii. 20, 21. Luke ii. 33—35. 1 Cor. xi. 17—22. Jam. i. 13—15;) if the prophet should also neglect to warn him of his danger, and through his neglect the man should fall and perish in his sins, notwithstanding all the righteousness that he had done, which could not atone for his sins; in that case the prophet would be condemned as accessory to his destruction. But if he faithfully warned the righteous, and put them upon their guard against apostasy and iniquity; the Lord would bless his warnings to preserve them from sin, and to promote their salvation; and the prophet would also be accepted, and be "pure from the ^a blood" even of such as perished notwithstanding. (Marg. Ref. t—y.—See on Note, 17—19. Notes, xviii. 24—27. xxxiii. 12, 13. Matt. xii. 43—45. xiii. 20, 21. 2 Pet. ii. 20—22. 1 John ii. 18, 19.)—The scriptures speak of persons and characters, as they appear to men. Numbers, who have been thought true believers, have apostatized and died in sin, as far as man can see: and if indeed a real Christian should thus apostatize, and die impenitent, his righteousness would not be remembered, and he would perish in his sins. But the security of the covenant of grace is this: "God will put his fear into the hearts of his ^b people, that they shall not depart from him." (Notes, Jer. xxxii. 39—41. John x. 26—31, v. 28. 1 Pet. i. 3—5.) And the holy scriptures are every where written in a popular style; and not with that studied regard to evident consistency, which appears in the works of very systematical divines.

V. 22—27. The prophet, being powerfully impelled by "the hand of the LORD," went forth into the plain, as he was ordered, that God might further commune with him. CHAP. IV

fore it for a number of days, to represent the siege and taking of that city, 1—8 : and to represent the famine, to which the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and the captives, would be reduced, by his own coarse, scanty, and ill-dressed diet during those days, 9—17.

more particular instructions, in solitude, prayer, and meditation. He was also informed, that they would put bands upon him : either his friends, as supposing him besides himself ; (Marg. Ref. e. g.—Note, Mark iii. 20, 21 ;) or his enemies, as enraged by his predictions. Some, however, explain this of the transactions recorded in the next chapter. (Note, iv. 1—8.)—His confinement and bands were emblems of the Jews, when shut up in Jerusalem by the Chaldeans ; and of their bondage after the city was taken. Thus he was prevented from going among the people : nay, the Lord declared that he would cause him to be dumb, that he might not be a reprover to them, because of their obstinate rebellion. Probably, these restraints were meant as a rebuke to the prophet, for his unbelieving fears and reluctancy to his work ; and to teach him submission to the divine will : but they were also intended to correct or punish the people, who were not disposed to welcome a faithful reprover ; and it may be supposed, that they had shewn some tokens of contempt and enmity, whilst he sat among them at Tel-abib. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. h, i.) The prophet, however, would not always continue thus silent : yet it was not intended that he should speak when he pleased, or when the people required him ; but when the Lord spake to him. Then he would open his mouth, and enable him to deliver his message with boldness and authority : (Notes, xxiv. 25—27. xxxiii. 21, 22. Eph. vi. 18—20 :) and placing life and death, the blessing and the curse, before the people, to leave them to their choice, and the effects of it, whether they would hear or forbear. (Marg. Ref. k—m.—Notes, ii. 3—8. 1 Cor. xiv. 36—40, v. 38. Rev. xxii. 10—12.)

Spake with me. (24) “Then the Spirit entered into me, and set me upon my feet : and he spake unto me.” Bp. Newcombe. Lowth. The original requires to be thus rendered. The last verb is masculine, the others feminine ; and the Speaker is evidently distinguished from the Spirit, who entered into Ezekiel : probably a voice came to him from the visible glory of JEHOVAH. (Notes, Matt. ii. 16, 17. xvii. 5—8.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—15.

We should receive the whole word of God in humble, obedient faith and love ; for every part of it is salutary and beneficial. Its doctrines, promises, precepts, warnings, examples, and denunciations, may all be turned into wholesome nourishment by faith and prayer : nay, the believer may deduce sweetness and comfort from those passages, which speak terror to the ungodly, whilst he thinks of Him, who has “delivered him from the wrath to come.” The word of Christ should therefore “dwell richly in us ;” but especially in those, who are to speak it to others : for if they are not well acquainted with it and experienced in it, they will not be able “rightly to divide” it, and apply it to their hearers.—The Lord is always ready to communicate divine instruction to those, whose minds are open to receive it ; and to assist their endeavours to understand the scriptures. (Notes, Ps. xxv. 8, 9. Prov. ii. 1—9. P. O. 1—9.) But, however sweet retirement, meditation, and communion with God may be ; yet we must prepare also for active service. We may say upon the mount, “It is good to be here :” but we must descend to struggle with temptations, to endure hardships, to face opposition, to bear our cross, and to follow our suffering Lord. (Note, Matt. xvii. 4.)—The work of the ministry generally appears very pleasant in the prospect, and whilst pious men are studying and preparing for it ; and doubtless it is a good and most desirable work : (Note, 1 Tim. iii. 1 :) yet those who mean, as ministers, to be “valiant for the truth” in this rebellious world, must prepare for severe trials and conflicts. We need not however hesitate to speak the words of God unto the people : for if we act by his commission, and according to his instructions, we may be sure that he will bear us out. But faithful ministers often meet with more difficulties among false brethren, than among profligates : and they who are sent to poor Indians and Pagans, have frequently found them more open to instruction and conviction, than men in Christian countries are. So that their hard language, not to be understood without an interpreter, has not so much impeded their success ; as the daring and hardened impiety of persons, brought up under the sound of the Gospel, would have done.—When sinners are very bold in the service of Satan, surely we ought not to be cowardly in the cause of God : when impiety and infidelity wax insolent and impudent, we should grow the more strenuous and zealous in opposing them : and if our enemies “set their faces as a flint, and make their brow as brass ;” the Lord can make ours as the adamant, and enable us to withstand deceivers and opposers to the face, without fearing their frowns, threatening, or rage. (Notes, Is. xlii. 1—4. 1. 7—9, v. 7. 1 Pet. iv. 1, 2.) But we should remember that his promises are intended to encourage us to attend on our duty. Having therefore such assurances of strength and support in the hour of trial ; we can have no just cause to fear any enemy : and if we “receive in our hearts,” as well as “hear with our ears, all the words of God ;” and then speak to the people as we have opportunity, “whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear ;” it should not greatly disquiet us, if those who despise the commandments of God will not hearken to our words. But though these things are our evident duty, and though there is a disposition to attend to them ; yet nature will object to difficult and perilous services. And when the Spirit of God powerfully operates on our fears, affections, and consciences, and we cannot but go whither he sends us, and speak what he commands : we may often feel great impatience and uneasiness, and “go in the bitterness and heat of our spirit.” So that, whilst angels are adoring the condescension of our God, in employing such sinful worms in his honourable work, and blessing him for the displays of his glory in his gracious dealings with us ; and all the glorious company are unanimously concurring in the execution of his purposes; we poor sinners, though specially favoured and honoured, may be discontented and repining at the services allotted us! Indeed it must be allowed to be very discouraging, when we are sent where there is little hope of being useful: and especially, when the more attentively our hearers are observed, the more desperate their wickedness appears to be. It may also astonish and almost stupify any considerate man, to compare the awful denunciations of God's word, with the lives of most who profess to believe it. We must not, however, spend much time, in associating with sinners, merely to make our observations; except in order to discover the best time and manner of addressing them: and even here timidity and carnal prudence will be apt to insinuate themselves, and dispose us to conceal or soften our message. Yet, if the Lord indeed intend us to preach his word, he will renew his calls, and constrain our obedience, by his strong hand upon us. (Notes, Jer. xx. 7—9. Acts iv. 13—22, vv. 19, 20. 2 Cor. v. 13—15.)

What an awful, important, and arduous work, is the ministry of the gospel! If unfaithful, we expose ourselves to the severest indignation of God, and become guilty of the murder of the souls, which perish by our default: and if faithful, we must expect to excite the indignation of all who do not profit by our solemn warnings. These considerations should render every one cautious, from what motives and in what manner he engages; that he may be sure that God has "made him a watchman:" they should teach us all to "take heed to ourselves, and to the minister," try that we have received of the Lord, that we may fulfil "it;" and to guard against ambition, avarice, and every thing which may tempt us to unfaithfulness: they should excite us to continual prayer for the increase of faith, spiritual knowledge, and that sufficiency which God alone can bestow; and to keep before our minds the awful account which must be rendered if sinners perish by our fault; that "the fear of him who is able to destroy both "body and soul in hell," may subordinate all our fears of those, "who can only kill the body, and after that have "no more that they can do." (Notes, Matt. x. 27, 28. Luke xii. 1—7, vv. 4, 5.) We cannot indeed prevail with men to attend to the truths and will of God; but we may hear his word, and declare it unto them, shewing them plainly both their danger and their remedy: and if we do this fully and faithfully, we shall "deliver our own souls," even though they perish in their sins. We should also remember, that we are required, not only to encourage and comfort those who appear to us to be righteous: they must be warned also; for it is by such warnings, that the Lord puts the upright upon their guard, and thus they are preserved from sin and unto salvation; and the minister is also exempted from guilt, as to those who deceive themselves, or turn back and perish in their evil ways. For many, of whom men have been most confident, have grown high-minded and secure, have met with stumbling blocks in their way, and have fallen and died in their iniquity. So that nothing, except actual perseverance, absolutely evinces the reality of grace and soundness of heart: and the unfaithful preacher, who does not warn men of these dangers, becomes guilty of their ruin, and their blood will be required at his hands. Surely then we should study to be very explicit and particular in our ministry; and seek to profit, rather than to please our hearers, or be commended by them! And the hearers of the gospel should not expect from those, "who watch for their souls," and have such an account to give of their ministry, smooth and soothing discourses: but very alarming and distinguishing warnings, exhortations, and reproofs. Gentleness and caution are not the most requisite qualifications for a watchman. When the house is on fire, or the assassin about to murder those who are asleep; they do not accuse him of impertinence or rudeness, if he awake them even with noise and violence: in such a case they prefer earnestness to courtesy; and should they not judge in like manner, when their souls are in danger? And ought not the feelings of the minister, who fears lest "the blood of the "people should be required at his hands," be consulted; as well as those of the auditors, who cannot endure to hear of "the terror of the Lord?"—But even where the minister does not allowedly temporize, and is obedient in many things to the word of God; he may in others expose himself to rebuke and chastisement, by timidity and procrastination: and the Lord sometimes lays aside for a season, such as have sinfully declined opportunities of usefulness. Where, however, the heart is upright, they will profit even by rebukes and suspensions.—The Lord's condescension and kindness in shewing us his glory, and communing with us sinful worms, notwithstanding our peevishness and perverseness, is very astonishing: but he will convince us of our insufficiency for any good thing, if he intend to use us as his instruments.—Meditation, study and prayer are proper preparations for service: yet after all, we should be dumb, when called to speak in the name of God, if he did not open our mouths, give us our message, and supply us with utterance and boldness. (Notes, Acts iv. 29—31.)—By painful experience his servants are taught humble submission, and dependence on him: and if they adhere to their instructions, they will be "a sweet savour unto God," both in those who hear their word, and in those who rebelliously reject or abuse it; and whoever attempts to silence them, takes the readiest way of bringing the heaviest judgments on himself, and on the community to which he belongs. (Note, 1 Thes. ii. 13—16.)

lem would be preserved, and that they should be delivered from the power of the king of Babylon: (Notes, Jer. xxviii. 2—14:) but Ezekiel by a most expressive sign was ordered to shew them the contrary. It is probable that this occurred, whilst he was shut up in his own house, and unable to speak to the people: (Note, iii. 22—27:) for by signs he might instruct such as came to him; and when his extraordinary conduct came to be known, many would go to see him from different motives. Thus it would become generally known among the captives, and at length be published and explained to the whole nation. It seems to have been a real transaction, not a vision; and all objections to this construction, taken from the uneasiness of the prophet in the situation here described, arise from forgetfulness of the power of God, who can render his servants easy in any situation. (Notes, Jer. xiii. 1—7. Hos. i. 2, 3.)—It is not, however, needful to suppose, that he never moved from this posture; but only that he habitually continued in it. A man may be said to keep his bed; though he be occasionally for a short time taken out of it. The circumstances of this vision prove, that the prophet did really perform what is here related; or else it could not have been “a sign unto the house of Israel” (3), unless they themselves had been eye-witnesses of it. (Comp. xii. 7. 11. Lowth. (Marg. Ref. d.))—He was ordered to draw a picture of Jerusalem on a tile, (an emblem of the meanness to which sin had reduced that holy city, and the speedy destruction which awaited it,) that by a general likeness every spectator might know what city was intended. He was then directed to place around it the similitude of those engines and works, which were used in sieges: and to take an iron pan, or a circular piece of iron, to place round the city as a wall; denoting the fortifications of Jerusalem, and the obstinate defence which would be made by its inhabitants. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.

a—c.) He himself represented the besiegers, by setting his face against the picture of the city. For three hundred and ninety days he was ordered to lie on his left side: these days denoted so many years. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. e, f.—Notes, Dan. vii. 23—27. ix. 24—27. Rev. xi. 1, 2.) The years may be calculated from the establishment of idolatry by Jeroboam in the kingdom of Israel, to the final desolations of the whole land by Nebuzar-adan, in the twenty-third year of Nebuchadnezzar, which the best chronologers compute to have been exactly three hundred and ninety years. (Jer. lii. 30.) In the siege of Jerusalem, and the ruin of the nation, they bore the punishment of their iniquity committed during those years; and Ezekiel, by lying so long on his left side, as a sign to them, typically bore it for them. (Marg. Ref. g, h.—Note, Lev. x. 16—18.)—When he had accomplished those days, he was ordered to lie forty days more on his right side; which represented the forty years, which intervened between Josiah’s reformation, and the same final desolations of the land, and were the more immediate cause of that catastrophe.—Some think that these four hundred and thirty days relate also to the days of the siege, deducting some time for the departure of the besiegers, when they went to fight with the Egyptians: but this is uncertain.—The prophet was thus required to set himself “against Jerusalem,” and to make bare, or stretch out, his arm, to represent the force and fury, with which the Chaldeans would conduct the siege. By this sign he prophesied against it: and the Lord would lay bands on him; that is, he would powerfully enable and even constrain him, to lie quietly in the posture appointed him, till the days were accomplished. (iii. 25. Note, viii. 1.)

V. 9—17. The prophet was moreover ordered to represent the famine, which would prevail during the siege, and among the captives, by the food which he used while thus made a sign to them. His bread, which was his chief or only support, was ordered to be made of different sorts of grain and pulse mixed together, several of which were seldom used for bread, except in times of urgent scarcity. (Marg.) The grain and pulse for this bread he was ordered to prepare beforehand for the three hundred and ninety days, during which he lay on his left side; for he might afterwards prepare for the other forty days which are not here mentioned (6). Of this coarse and unpalatable food he was allowed not much more than ten ounces a day, as small a quantity as life could well be supported with; nor was he permitted to drink more than about a pint and half of water a day, without any other liquor. This denoted, that the besieged Jews, and afterwards the captives, would be reduced to very scanty allowance of the coarsest food; and that they would suffer as much by thirst as by famine. (Marg. Ref. o.—Note, Lev. xxvi. 25, 26.)—This bread was to be eaten “as barley-cakes,” as ordinary food, dressed in the meanest and hastiest manner: and to shew how the Jews would be reduced to feed on such things, as at other times they would have nauseated; (Note, Job vi. 5—7;) and that they would be constrained to disregard the distinction between clean and unclean meats; (Notes, Dan. i. 8—16, v. 8. Hos. ix. 4—6;) he was ordered to use human dung as fuel, baking the cakes in the ashes of it; and to do it in the sight of the people that they might know it.—The prophet seems not to have objected to any other part of the injunctions laid upon him, except this. He did not urge, that the representation of the siege would expose him to contempt; that it would subject him to reproach, thus to appear as the enemy of Jerusalem; that the allotted provisions were so coarse and scanty, that his health would be ruined by living so long on them; or that the posture, in which he was to lie would be very painful and distressing. In all these respects he unreservedly acquiesced: but, supposing that by this last appointment he should contract ceremonial defilement; he objected that he had never been used to pollute his soul by eating any thing unclean, from his youth up to that day. (Marg. Ref. p—t.—Notes, Ex. xxii. 29—31, v. 31. Lev. xi. 39, 40. xvii. 12—16. Deut. xiv. 21. Is. lxvi. 3, 4. Acts x. 9—16.) And though his scruple was groundless, (for it does not appear, that it would have been a violation of the ritual law;) yet the Lord condescended to allow him, instead of human dung, to use cow’s or bullock’s dung for fuel, 15 Then he said unto me, Lo, I have given thee cow’s dung for man’s dung, and thou shalt prepare thy bread therewith.

16 Moreover he said unto me, Son of man, behold, ^u I will break the staff of bread in Jerusalem, and they shall ^x eat bread by weight, and with care; and they shall drink water by measure, and with astonishment:

which is commonly used in that way in the east, as it is in many parts of England at this day.—By the subsequent explication it appears, that though the hardships to be endured by the captives were included; yet that the famine, which raged in Jerusalem during the siege, was principally intended. Then the Lord would break the staff of bread, which is the chief support of life: and, their bread and water being measured to them in very small quantities, they must eat and drink with astonishment; perceiving how fast their scanty stock of provisions wasted, and how soon they were likely to perish miserably by hunger and thirst. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

All our powers and capacities should be diligently employed, in receiving instruction from God, and in promoting his glory, as far as we are capable of it. In various ways he preaches to our senses: his word addresses our ears as the avenues to the heart; the sacramental signs and pledges of spiritual blessings preach to our eyes, that by them we may be instructed and affected. These external representations often appear mean and despicable to the proud, carnal, and ignorant, who look no further than the outward sign: but to the humble, enlightened, and spiritual mind, they are replete with instruction, caution, and encouragement. (P. O. Josh. iv.) For persons of this character will enquire into the meaning of every external observance, especially those which are of divine appointment; and search out their use and intention, that they may profit by them.—The Lord often calls his most favoured servants to the sharpest sufferings and the hardest services; which would be very distressing to them, were they not assured of proportionable supports. But no self-denial, labour, scanty, and unsavoury fare, hard lodging, uneasy posture, can render those uncomfortable, to whom the Lord manifests his gracious presence, and communicates his abundant consolations. (Note, Acts xvi. 25—28.) When we duly consider what severe and long continued self-denial our gracious God of old required of his servants, and recollect that it was their wisdom and happiness, as well as duty, to render it; we shall be the better reconciled to the exercise of that moderate self-denial to which he calls us; and shall be shamed out of our reluctance to it, and impatience under it.—Those, who love the souls of men, would be ready to endure any temporal inconvenience or suffering, to bring them to a sense of their guilt and danger, and to take them off from presumptuous confidences: and, as example is more convincing than words, it behoves all, who desire to be useful ministers, to habituate themselves to a holy indifference about worldly pleasures and interests; that they may exemplify the duties which they inculcate, and by their prompt and cheerful obedience to apparently hard commands, put those to shame, who refuse obedience in the most favourable circumstances.—Indeed, when we consider with what evils sin has filled the earth, we should all prepare for the worst: we know not how soon we may be forced to eat our refuse food by measure, and to drink our short allowance of water with astonishment; and be glad of the meanest sustenance which we now loathe and throw away. But if Jesus have “delivered us from the wrath to come,” and we have long been habituated to the practice of holiness; we shall fear sin and pollution more than any external hardship: and, whatever troubles we experience, we shall not be left to “consume away in our iniquities.”—No external profession or privilege can exempt sinners from deserved punishment: God will set his face against hypocrites, as well as infidels and profligates: and his ministers must do the same, however they may be reviled for it.—All who do not repent and believe the gospel, must at length bear their own iniquity in that place of torment, where not so much as a drop of water can be procured to cool the tongue: and they, who are connected with the wicked, often suffer many temporal afflictions in consequence of it. But Christ alone “bare our sins, in his own body on the tree:” to expiate our guilt, he fasted, thirsted, agonized, and died. Those who believe in him, “shall not come into condemnation; but are passed from death unto life:” and, as he shews such compassion even to their scruples; they should not attempt to impose on their brethren the most indifferent observances, which are declined professedly from a principle of conscience.

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1—4. This command seems to have been given, about the same time as the foregoing. The barber's razor was to be used in shaving his head and beard;

and perhaps the “sharp knife,” or sword, in smiting a division of the hair: or it may be rendered, “Take thee a “sharp knife, even take thee a barber's razor;” the former may be understood of any sort of sharp instrument, the latter describing the kind.—Jerusalem had been the head of the nation of Israel, and the most favoured city upon earth: her numerous inhabitants were her ornament and strength, as the hair is the ornament of the head, and the beard is the token of manhood. But the city was to be desolated and levelled with the ground. (Note, Is. vii. 20.) Then her ornament and strength were taken away: and as the shaving of the Nazarite disannulled his vow; (Note, Num. vi. 5;) so perhaps this indicated, that the token of her consecration to God was destroyed by her sins. This shewed the severity of the judgment of God: and the weighing of the hair intimated the strict justice and exact wisdom, in which the inhabitants of Jerusalem were consigned to their several punishments. The third part of the hair, which was burned with fire, “in the midst of the “city,” that is, the picture of the city before mentioned, at the end of the siege, or the days which the prophet lay before it, (Notes, iv. 1—8.) denoted, that a third part of the Jews, who had taken refuge in Jerusalem, would perish by famine, pestilence, or conflagrations, during the siege, or when it was terminated: the third part, smitten with a knife or sword, represented those, who were slain by the besiegers in attempting to escape: and the third part scattered in the wind, represented those who fled or were carried captives into other countries; who would be nursed by the justice of God and the cruelty of their enemies, into every place. A few hairs, which the prophet was ordered to bind in his skirts, as if they were to be preserved, but of which some were afterwards cast into the fire, signified the remnant, who were left in the land under Gedaliah, and seemed to have acquired a settlement: till the murder of Gedaliah, and the flight of the rest into Egypt, overturned the whole design. Most of them perished miserably: and the Chaldeans, exasperated by their detection to the Egyptians, seemed to have treated the other Jews with greater severity on their account, and to have utterly desolated the land. (Notes, Jer. xl—xlv. lii. 30.)—“Marmonides ... observes, upon this place, that the priests “were forbidden to shave their heads, (xliv. 20,) and not “allowed to do it in the time of mourning; (Lev. xxi. 5;) “from whence that author concludes, that what the pro-

V. 5—10. The Lord here explained this sign to be (that is, to represent) Jerusalem. He had placed that city in the midst of the most populous and prosperous nations then on earth, as the place of his temple, and the centre of his worship; that his perfections, truths, laws, and ordinances might be known through the Jews to others for the glory of his name. Thus she was as the head among the cities and nations of the earth.—‘It was a city set on a hill, ⁿ on purpose that it might be a pattern of religion and virtue to them. Matt. v. 14.’ Lowth. (Notes, xvi. 9—14. Deut. iv. 6—8. 1 Kings viii. 41—43. Matt. v. 14—16. Rom. iii. 1, 2.) But the inhabitants of this favoured city had perverted the ordinances of God, making them the cloke or occasion of their sins: they had changed the glorious Object of their worship for the most worthless idols and superstitions; they had gone further from his statutes, and more multiplied their abominations, than the Gentiles themselves: they were not content with copying the judgments, the rites, customs, or worship of any one heathen nation; but they collected from them all, and improved on them all. (Notes, xvi. 44—51. 2 Kings xxi. 9—13.)—They had not been so constant and zealous for the true religion as the Gentiles had in a false one. (Marg. Ref. m—o.—Note, Jer. ii. 19—12.) As they thus dishonoured God among the heathen, he determined to vindicate his insulted honour in their sight, by executing vengeance upon the Jews with a severity as unexampled as their guilt. (Marg. Ref. p—r.—Notes, xxiii. 45. Lam. iv. 6. Dan. ix. 12.) In—somuch, that in the extremity of famine they should eat one another; even parents should eat the flesh of their children, and children of their parents, without any distinction; whilst the wretched remnant of them would be dispersed into every part of the earth. (Marg. Ref. s.—Note, Lev. xxvi. 29.) The destruction of Jerusalem, and the captivity of its inhabitants by the Chaldeans were primarily intended; and yet the desolations and dispersions afterwards caused by the Romans, and the desolate state of this once favoured nation to this day, form a still more awful accomplishment of the prophecy.

A prediction of the destruction of the idols and idolaters of Israel, and that a remnant shall be saved, 1—10. The prophet is ordered to use vehement expressions, to shew his detestation of the sins, and his sorrow for the calamities, of his people, 11—14.

has been greatly injured and dishonoured; he is comforted, when he obtains satisfaction for the injury, and can wipe away the disgrace. The Jews had greatly dishonoured God, and caused the heathen to blaspheme his holy religion: but his judgments executed on them manifested his power, justice, holiness, and truth; stopped the mouths of blasphemers; and reflected honour on his law and worship. Such “vengeance belongeth unto God;” and he was determined not to rest, till he had satisfied his justice, and glorified his name in their condign punishment; and in this he would take pleasure. For though he “delights not in the death of a sinner,” yet he delights in acting in a manner worthy of himself, even by taking vengeance on incorrigible rebels. This sentence he had denounced in his zeal for his own glory; and he would accomplish it, in most tremendous vengeance upon the Jews. (Notes, xvi. 35—43. xxi. 17. Is. i. 21—24. lix. 16—19. lxiii. 1—6.)

V. 14—17. The event would shew, that God had denounced these tremendous judgments, from a due regard to the honour of his own name, which would also assuredly induce him to accomplish them in the most tremendous manner. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, iv. 9—17. xiv. 13—23. xxxiii. 24—29. Deut. xxviii. 37. xxix. 21—25. 1 Kings ix. 7—9. Lam. ii. 15, 16.)—An instruction. (15) ‘They shall learn from such an example of vengeance, to hear me and to be afraid of my judgments.’ Lowth. (Note, Deut. xiii. 6—11.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It is so difficult to make men sensible of their guilt and danger; that we should employ for this purpose every expedient, argument, or illustration, which we can devise.—The severest vengeance of God is regulated by the most perfect wisdom and justice: every distinction, when abused, increases guilt and condemnation: and to whatever refuge sinners flee, the fire and sword of the Lord’s indignation will overtake them.—The professors of Christianity are as a city on a hill, in the midst of the nations of the earth; their conduct cannot be hid. If it consist with their holy profession, God will be glorified, his truths and worship recommended, and a blessing through them communicated to mankind. But alas! too many of them are the vilest of men: they depart from the judgments and statutes of God, even more than the blind Pagans; they turn his grace into licentiousness, and exceed in fraud, oppression, cruelty, impiety, and iniquity, the worst of the idolaters, among whom they disgrace the Christian name. But let such persons read, in the temporal judgments executed on the Jewish nation, the awful sentence, which will be denounced against them “in the day of wrath,” when God shall deal with them according to their abominations. However he may now spare guilty nations or individuals; he will then have no pity on these, who have defiled his sanctuary, and disgraced his gospel, with their detestable things. Nor will he rest, or be “comforted” respecting them, till by their condign punishment he have wiped off the dishonour, which their crimes have cast upon his name and cause; and till he have satisfied his justice, in executing the most dreadful denunciations which he has spoken in his zeal. Nor let those churches, who have changed, or made of none effect, his judgments and statutes, that they might observe their own traditions, and maintain their detestable idolatries and superstitions, expect to escape the doom of Jerusalem. By sore judgments will the Lord plead against them, and make them “a reproach, a taunt, an instruction, and an astonishment:” for he has spoken, and all shall know his truth in the accomplishment of his word. But let us be instructed by such examples and warnings; let us intreat the Lord to glorify himself in our salvation; and let us endeavour to “adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things.” Then will he rejoice over us to do us good; all his promises will belong to us, all his perfections be engaged for our salvation; and “only with our eyes shall we behold, and see the destruction of the wicked.”

NOTES.

CHAP. VI. V. 2, 3. The mountains in the land of Israel, or the whole land of promise, had been polluted with the idolatries of the people. The prophet was there—

12 He that is ² far off shall die of the pestilence; and he that is near shall fall by the sword; and he that remaineth and is besieged shall die by the famine: ^a thus will I accomplish my fury upon them.

13 Then shall ye know that I am the LORD, ^b when their slain men shall be among their idols round about their altars, ^c upon every high hill, in all the tops of the mountains, and under every green tree, and under every thick oak, the place where they did offer sweet savour to all their idols.

14 So ^d will I stretch out my hand upon them, and make the land desolate, yea, ^e more desolate than the wilderness toward ^e Diblath, in all their habitations: and they shall know that I am the LORD.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Whatever men idolize or abuse to sin will conduce to their misery, or be involved in their ruin: and those who hate the knowledge of God through love of sin, shall be made to know him by experiencing “the power of his wrath.” (Note, Ps. xc. 11.) The superstitions, to which many trust for safety, often prove the immediate cause of their ruin: and it is as awful for a sinner to be cut off, in the act of worshipping an image or a creature, as in the practice of the grossest immorality; for “the LORD is a jealous God, and will not give his glory to another.”—However poor benighted Pagans may be spared in their idolatries; if “the mountains of Israel,” the countries favoured with “the oracles of God,” become the receptacle of such abominations, they may expect his severest vengeance: and it will not be long before idols and idolatry will be as awfully and effectually destroyed out of the professed Christian church, as they were from among the Jews.—Men’s wickedness springs from forgetfulness of God, and disregard to their relations and obligations to him. Whatever therefore brings them to “remember him,” and their sins against him, should be considered as a blessing.—True repentance springs from the knowledge of God and of ourselves: this shews the evil and malignity of our transgressions, the depraved propensity of our hearts to depart from him; and the innumerable provocations committed against him, in our thoughts, words, and works, by all our faculties and senses, our bodies and souls. Then we perceive how basely ungrateful we have been for his goodness, and how much we have done to weary out his patience, and to violate our engagements and obligations to him: our self-justification and self-admiration will thus be turned into humble confessions of guilt and self-abhorrence before God: and this will lead us to hope in his mercy alone, to acknowledge his truth and justice in all our corrections, and to return to his service with uprightness of heart, renouncing all our formerly beloved, but now loathed, idolatries and iniquities. But men in general, even among professed Christians, are very remote from this penitent frame of mind: they cavil at the threatenings of scripture, as severe or unjust; or they disregard them as vain words, and are secure and confident upon the brink of destruction. It therefore behoves such of us, as are called to preach the word of God, to speak and act as men in earnest, who are deeply affected with abhorrence of the sins against which we protest, and with compassion for those against whom we denounce the vengeance of God. This vehemence of language and gesture will excite the disgust, the ridicule, or the rage of proud and carnal men, and expose us to contempt and calumny; but if we know the worth of souls, and the danger to which unbelievers are exposed; we shall deem every sinner, who takes warning to flee to Jesus for deliverance “from the wrath to come,” an abundant recompence for the derision and obloquy, which we may encounter from tens of thousands, who are thronging the broad road to destruction; and who will soon be convinced, that no earnestness could possibly be too great in such a cause.

NOTES.

CHAP. VII. V. 2, 3. The abrupt manner, and the many repetitions, of this prophecy, shewed that the prophet was greatly affected by the prospect of the calamities which he predicted: as men cry, ‘Fire, fire! Thieves, thieves!’ when they or others are in imminent danger.—The Lord had long spared the people, or only inflicted partial judgments: but “the end” was now come to their establishment and prosperity; and his vengeance would desolate the four corners of the land, including Israel as

V. 7. The predicted day of vengeance which watched for the Jews (6), was at hand: the day dawned, the tokens of approaching ruin were discernible: the report of the Chaldean invasion was no vain rumour; not like the echo or reverberated sound upon the mountains, by which a single voice might be mistaken for the noise of a multitude; for the Chaldean army was indeed upon the march, and would soon arrive and bring destruction with them. 'Not 'such a joyful sound as useth to echo from the mountains, 'by which the treaders of the grapes express their satisfaction, at the time of vintage, which the Hebrew word... V. 10, 11. The rod, or sceptre, of authority among the Jews, had budded into pride, ambition, and tyranny, and blossomed into violence and oppression; and these produced such an increase of wickedness, as brought down the judgments of God upon them. (Marg. Ref. u—y.—Notes, xix. 10—13. xxi. 9—13. Num. xvii. 6—11.) Or, Nebuchadnezzar, his rod of correction, was grown exceedingly in power, pride, violence, and rapacity; and thus was prepared to punish the Jews: and their pride, violence, and iniquity, exposed them to this prosperous scourge of God. (Note, Is. x. 5, 6.) So that nothing would remain in Judah or Jerusalem, of all their multitude and riches; nor any to lament those that were slain or carried captive.—The word translated "any of their's," is by some supposed to mean, their boasters, or tumultuous ones. V. 12, 13. In general men think that they have reason to rejoice, if they are able to buy estates; and to lament, if obliged to sell their houses and lands. But this would by no means be the case of the Jews, at that time; for the buyer would soon be driven from his purchased possession; and the seller would only part with what must in a very short time have been torn from him: (Marg. Ref. b—d.—Notes, Is. xxiv. 1—12, vv. 1, 2. 1 Cor. vii. 29—31:) because the wrath of God against the whole multitude would soon desolate the land; and even they, who should survive these calamities, would not be able to return to their possessions at the year of Jubilee, being detained captive at Babylon. (Notes, Lev. xxv. 8—13, v. 13. 14—17. 25—30. Jer. xxxii. 6—15. 42—44.) None of them would return, till the seventy years of the captivity were accomplished;

But, as they had defiled the courts of it, and even the sanctuary itself, by their detestable idols, the Lord determined to remove them far from it into captivity; or to make it as "an unclean thing," being defiled by the presence of the Chaldeans, and by the slaughter there committed. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—15.

“An end” will soon come to all the prosperity and enjoyment of impenitent sinners, in every corner of the earth. Now is the day of the Lord’s patience and mercy: but “the day is at hand,” when he will send his anger upon ungodly men, and judge and recompense them according to their ways, without mercy or pity: then “they that are filthy will continue filthy still,” and their abominations shall be in the midst of them for ever. (Note, Rev. xxii. 10—12, v. 11.) This destruction is indeed “an evil, an only evil,” a natural evil, of magnitude proportioned to the moral evil and desert of sin: and all other sufferings may be deemed trivial, and scarcely worth notice when compared with it. We should therefore loudly sound the alarm, and strenuously and earnestly call on men “to flee from the wrath to come.” For this misery continually overtakes one and another of the ungodly, yea immense multitudes every year; and it “watcheth” for every one of them. (Note, Luke xxi. 34—36.)—The morning of our dying day, and of the day of judgment, will soon dawn: the time of the sinner’s trouble is at hand; and those, who have treated all the warnings of God’s word and providence as false alarms, will find them awfully realized, and will no more consider them as “the sounding of the mournful tains.” What then will they think of their presumptuous delays and carnal security, when the day of life and of grace shall expire! when the anger of God shall be accomplished on them! when vain mirth, self-flattery, and false hope shall terminate in “weeping, wailing, and gnashing of teeth!” Indeed, whilst men are indulging their pride and lusts, and these are budding, blooming, and bringing forth fruit unto death; the instruments of vengeance are also preparing: and thus sudden destruction comes, from which there is no escape. (Note, 1 Thes. 1—3.)—Though we in this land should continue to be favoured with national peace and temporal prosperity; yet how soon will the time arrive, when all our joys and so

The prophet is, in vision, brought to Jerusalem and to the temple, 1—4. He sees “the image of Jealousy” by the gate of the altar; the elders of Israel worshipping base idols in a secret chamber of the temple; women weeping for Tammuz; and men with their backs to the temple, worshipping the sun, 5—16. The Lord appeals to him, whether such abominations do not deserve the severest punishment, 17, 18.

rows about worldly gain and loss will be no more! “The fashion of this world passeth away,” and all our eagerness and anxiety about it are vain and useless. The wrath of God has filled the earth with trouble and death: men must soon be torn from their possessions, to return no more to them; and how wretched must they be, who have no inheritance in that world, to which we are all hastening, and from which there is no return! nor can any man strengthen himself in iniquity, so as to outbrave or sustain these tremendous evils.

V. 16—27.

All efforts to elude divine vengeance, in this world or the next, must be unavailing: the wrath of God dismays the most intrepid; their “hands hang down and their knees wax feeble,” and inward horror accompanies their outward calamities and confusion. And if, in the siege and taking of cities, men cast away their gold and silver, as an encumbrance rather than a security; what judgment will sinners form of the value of their now idolized wealth, in the final “day of wrath and perdition of ungodly men?” Even here they can neither comfort the wounded heart, nor ease the burdened conscience, nor purchase health and ease; and in some cases they will not even procure food to satisfy the hunger of their famished possessors. Yet after all that can be said, men will set their hearts on such lying vanities; and multiply crimes, and treasure up wrath, remorse, and horror, in order to increase such riches, as will yield no comfort when they most want it, and which must be left for ever!—Even in religion, human folly and depravity are equally conspicuous: men value themselves on distinctions and forms, which they disgrace by their crimes, and which will eventually increase their condemnation! But whatever real or supposed decency, beauty, or majesty there may be in any of our modes of worship; God will deem them polluted to all such as make them the cloke of their iniquities: and he has often permitted the most impious, rapacious, and cruel of the nations, to plunder and waste those professing churches, which have dishonoured him by their crimes.—In vain do they seek peace or deliverance from their enemies, if unrepented sins exclude them from the peace and protection of God. “Mischief” must at length “come upon mischief, and rumour upon rumour:” whilst neither prophet, priest, counsellor, nor prince can escape, or shew others any way of deliverance. For they, who will not mourn for sin with “godly sorrow,” must bewail its effects with bitter lamen-

house, ^b and the elders of Judah sat before me, ^c that the hand of the Lord God fell there upon me.

2 Then ^d I beheld, and lo a likeness as the appearance of fire: from the appearance of his loins even downward, fire; and from his loins even upward, as the appearance of brightness, as the colour of amber.

3 And ^e he put forth the form of an hand, and took me by a lock of mine head; and ^f the Spirit lifted me up be-tations, being covered with confusion and clothed with desolation. To this awful ruin the whole multitude of the human species is exposed; yet “a remnant according to the election of grace” shall escape. These may be known by their mourning for sin, with broken hearts and penitent confessions, like “doves of the valleys;” and by becoming harmless, pure, gentle, modest, and loving, according to that instructive emblem. Such penitents shall obtain pardon and peace by faith in Jesus Christ, and those riches, which will give comfort in the hour of death and profit them in the day of wrath. (Notes, Eph. iii. 8. Rev. iii. 18, 19, v. 18.) May the Lord incline and enable us to choose and seek this “good part, which shall never be taken from us!”

NOTES

CHAP. VIII. V. 1. Only fourteen months, or four hundred and twenty days, (namely, from the fifth day of the fourth month, in the fifth year of Jehoiachin’s captivity, to the fifth day of the sixth month, of the sixth year after that event;) seem to have passed from Ezekiel’s first vision to the date of this chapter; (Note, i. 1—3;) which would not allow time for his lying three hundred and ninety days on his left side, and forty on his right side, according to the interpretation given of that transaction: and for the seven days during which he sat silent. (Notes, iii. 12—15. iv.) But this might be their leap-year, to which a full month of thirty days was added, as it is well known: or this transaction might take place after the expiration of the three hundred and ninety days, and before the forty days were entered on.—At the time however, here mentioned, the prophet was sitting in his house, and was attended by some of the elders of Judah, who were in captivity: perhaps it was the sabbath day, and they came to attend his instructions, as they had neither temple nor synagogue to resort to; or they came to consult him about some of their affairs. (Marg. Ref. b.—Notes, xiv. 1—5, v. 1. xx. 1—3. xxxiii. 30—33.) Whilst they were present, he was seized by a powerful divine impulse, and cast into an extasy, or trance, and had the following vision presented to his mind. (Marg. Ref. c.—Note, i. 1—3, v. 1.)

V. 2—4. Doubtless this was the same appearance which Ezekiel had before seen: “a likeness,” that is, of a man upon a throne, “as the appearance of fire downward,” denoting the terrible and righteous indignation of God against the rebellious Jews; and as of “brightness

4 And, behold, ^kthe glory of the God of Israel ^{was} there, according to the vision that I saw in the plain.

5 Then said he unto me, Son of man, ^llift up thine eyes now the way toward the north. So I lifted up mine eyes the way toward the north, and behold, northward ^mat the gate of the altar, this image of jealousy in the entry.

6 He said furthermore unto me, Son of man, ⁿseest thou what they do? ^oeven the great abominations that the house of Israel committeth here, ^pthat I should go far off from my sanctuary? but turn thee yet again, ^{and} thou shalt see ^qgreater abominations.

7 ¶ And he brought me to ^rthe door of the court; and when I looked, behold a hole in the wall.

8 Then said he unto me, Son of man, ^sdig now in the wall: and when I had digged in the wall, behold a door.

9 And he said unto me, Go in, and behold the wicked abominations that they do here.

10 So I went in and saw; and behold ^tevery form of creeping things, and abominable beasts, and all the idols of the house of Israel, pourtrayed upon the wall round about.

11 And there stood before them ^useventy men of the ancients of the house of Israel, and in the midst of them stood Jaazaniah the son of ^xShaphan, with ^yevery man his censer in his hand; and a thick cloud of incense went up.

12 Then said he unto me, Son of man, ^ahast thou seen what the ^aancients of the house of Israel do ^bin the dark, every man in the chambers of his imagery? for they say, ^c'The LORD seeth us not; the LORD hath forsaken the earth.

"and of the colour of amber" upward, perhaps implying the essential glory and excellency of the eternal Son of God, as they appear to the inhabitants of heaven. (Marg. Ref. d.—Note, i. 26—28.)—This glorious person seemed, in vision, to put forth the form of a hand, and to take hold of a lock of the prophet's hair, and at the same time the Spirit lifted him up in the vision of God, and conveyed him to Jerusalem, to the entrance of the inner court of the temple from the north, by that gate which was called the altar-gate. (Marg. Ref. e—g.)—There was "a seat," or nich, prepared for some base idol, perhaps Baal, or Molech, which was called "the image of jealousy;" (Marg. Ref. h, i.—Note, 2 Kings xxi. 7, 8, v. 7;) because the open worship of this idol provoked the Lord to jealousy, even as the open adultery of a woman, in the house of her husband, would excite his jealousy. (Notes, Ex. xx. 5. xxxiv. 11—17, v. 14. 1 Cor. x. 18—22.) At the same time the glory of the Lord, according to what the prophet had formerly seen in the plain, appeared to him; (Marg. Ref. k.—Note, i;) which intimated that JEHOVAH had not yet withdrawn his presence from the temple, though he had been treated with such marked contempt, by the open preference given by the Jews to a base idol.—The whole was presented in vision before the prophet's mind, whilst he continued in his own house: (Notes, iii. 12—15. xi. 1—3. 22—25. Acts viii. 36—40, vv. 39, 40. 2 Cor. xii. 1—6, vv. 2—4;) but doubtless it was an exact discovery of the idolatries committed at the temple; and it was intended to shew the justice of the predicted vengeance, and to represent the reason and manner of the Lord's departure from his professed worshippers.

The form of a hand. (3) 'Just as the form of a hand appeared writing upon the wall, Dan. v. 5.' Lowth.

V. 6. That I, &c.] The detestable idolatries, committed even at the temple of God, would constrain him to leave it and the people, to the merciless ravages of their enemies. He could not, consistently with his honour, dwell any longer in his polluted sanctuary, or among such abominable idolaters. The Jews indeed acted, as if they had determined to exclude JEHOVAH from his temple, and drive him from among them: for the injured husband must put his wife away, when her adulteries become notorious and abandoned; or else his own reputation will suffer (Marg. Ref. l—p.—Notes, vii. 20—22. x. 18, 19. xi. 22—25. Deut. xxxi. 18. 2 Chr. xxxvi. 14—17. Lam. ii. 6, 7.) But, as if this one image, openly worshipped in the court of the temple, had been a small matter, the prophet was ordered to turn his eyes another way, and he would discover still more and greater abominations, 'because committed by persons of greater authority, and nearer the place of my immediate presence. 11. 14. 16.' Lowth.

V. 7—12. When the prophet had been conducted to some door of the court of the temple, he found a wall: this seems to have been built, in order to conceal the idolatries, secretly practised by the elders in the chambers of the temple, which had been converted into a sort of chapel for that purpose; and to which, probably, they had a private entrance. But when he had examined this wall, he discovered a hole: and being ordered to dig or to work it to make it larger, he found a door which had been walled up, by which he was commanded to enter. There he saw all kinds of reptiles and unclean beasts, such as the Egyptian tians used to worship; and all the idols, which Israel or Judah had ever worshipped, painted around upon the wall: and before them seventy men of the elders of Israel, (according to the number of the sanhedrim, or great council of the nation,) were collected together. One of them he knew to be Jaazaniah, (who perhaps was president of the council, or a very eminent man among them;) and there were they, as consecrated priests of this rabble of dunghill-gods, every man with his censer in his hand, lavishly burning incense, and presenting adorations.—This indeed was shewn to the prophet in a vision: but such was the actual conduct of the rulers and elders of Judah, in their dark recesses, in the chambers of the temple, which they secretly appropriated to their images; and, as some think, in the private chambers of their own houses also, or according to the devices and imaginations of their own hearts. For they concluded, that God did not see them, and that he had “forsaken the earth,” or the land. He did not deliver the people out of their difficulties; because they continued in sin, and had not sought him with sincere repentance, faith, and prayer, but merely in hypocrisy: and they concluded that he either could not, or would not, help them; and that they were authorized to seek help from some other quarter, as Saul did to his own destruction. (Notes, 1 Chr. x. 13, 14. 2 Chr. xxviii. 22, 23.) Nay, they seem to have questioned the existence, or the omnipresence and omniscience, of JEHOVAH: they concluded, that no good would come from waiting on him, nor any harm from forsaking him: and they determined to seek help from those idols, whose licentious characters and worship they loved, in proportion as they hated the holy character, worship, and service of JEHOVAH. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, ix. 8—11. Ex. xxxii. 1—6. P. O. 1—14. Deut. iv. 15—19. Job xxii. 5—14. Ps. xciv. 1—11. Jer. xlv. 15—23.)

V. 13, 14. Marg. Ref.—Weeping, &c. (14) It is not agreed who or what Tammuz was, or on what account this idolatrous ceremony was observed in honour of him. But it is generally allowed, that he was some very profligate man, who was deified after his death; and that this annual lamentation for him was attended with the most infamous licentiousness: and concerning such a union of impiety and immorality, the less we know the better. (Notes, Ex. xxiii. 13. Is. lxv. 11, 12.)

V. 15. Greater, &c.] This expression may be rendered “great abominations besides these.” And indeed we can scarcely conceive greater abominations than those before mentioned.

V. 16. These twenty-five men are supposed to have been priests, who having stationed themselves in the inner court, close to the porch, and entrance into the holy sanctuary; turned their backs on the temple of God to worship the rising sun. The Holy of holies was at the west end of the sanctuary, which was westward of the altar: so that they could not worship the sun with their faces to the east, without turning their backs on the Lord and his holy place. (Marg. Ref.—Note, xlv. 8, 9.)—We cannot doubt that the practice of turning to the east, in some parts of publick worship, which is still retained in many Christian churches, was originally borrowed from idolaters, who worshipped the sun: and though it is possible for us to be superstitiously afraid of superstition, respecting any indifferent posture or ceremony; yet those, who are very tenacious of this custom, would do well to consider its original, in order to abate their excessive attachment to it.

V. 17. (Marg. Ref.) The Jews were not only guilty of these gross and detestable idolatries, but also of oppression and injustice equally atrocious. Thus they used every means to provoke the Lord to anger.—It is not certain, whether the expression, “They put the branch to their nose,” refers to some idolatrous practice; or to some methods then in use, by which men endeavoured to exasperate others, and to shew their contempt and defiance of them. The LXX render it, Αυτοι ως μωκτηριζοντες: “They are as those who mock.” (Luke xvi. 14. Gr.) ‘They add more fuel to my wrath, which will burst out like a flame to consume them; just as if one should lay a heap of dry sticks upon a fire.’ Lightfoot in Lowth.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6

The “wrath of God, revealed from heaven” against sinners, appears rigorous and extreme, in proportion as men are ignorant of his perfections, of the evil of sin, and of the abominations which are every where committed. If it should please God to give any man a very clear view of his glorious majesty and authority, and of the evil that is in every act of rebellion against him; and should at once present before him, in vision, all the abominations that are continually committing in any one city; there can be little doubt that he would be prepared to justify God in the severest vengeance, which he could inflict upon it. We are not thus acquainted with all the wickedness, which is present to his all-seeing eye: yet, if we carefully search the scriptures, and compare with them all that we can recollect and are conscious of, in our own thoughts, words, and works; if we carefully watch our own hearts and experience, and diligently observe the conduct of the world around us; we shall entertain far more affecting views of human depravity, and of the justice of God in his temporal and eternal judgments, than we previously had: we shall learn to drop our objections, silently “to submit to his righteousness,” and patiently to wait for that day, when he will “bring to light the hidden things of darkness,” and shew the reasons of all his dispensations: and this will make us very thankful, that “there is forgiveness with him,” and “plenteous redemption” for hell-deserving sinners.—The carelessness with which men provoke God, and prefer every worthless idol and base lust, to his favour and service, sufficiently mark the apostasy, rebellion, ingratitude, and enmity of the human heart: but generally the nearer we come to the sanctuary, the viler iniquities we discover by diligent investigation. It would peculiarly astonish and shock a pious mind, to be shewn all the abominations which have been committed by the professed patrons of religion, in every part of the world. The superstition and idolatry, the blasphemous pride and ambition, the fraud and imposture, the avarice, perjury, persecution, cruelty, and licentiousness, by which the Lord has been provoked to jealousy, as it were, in the inner court of the temple, have in too many instances been notorious to all the world. And thus not only numerous individuals, but even many churches, have provoked the Lord to forsake them, as he repeatedly did his temple at Jerusalem. (Notes, Jer. vii. 3—15. P. O. Rev. xviii. 9—19.)

V. 7—18.

The abominations, which all men see and cry shame of, are not always the worst, and never the whole, which provokes to jealousy the holy and righteous and heart-destroyers, by God’s command, slay the rest, beginning at the sanctuary, 5—7. God answers the prophet’s intercession, by shewing the people’s enormous wickedness, 8—10. The person, employed to mark the remnant, reports that he has executed his commission, 11.

searching God. Frequently still more atrocious things are done in secret by those, who “love darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil.” Such persons either forget, or atheistically deny, that “the LORD seeth them,” and act as if he had “forsaken the earth.” But he will detect their hypocrisy: and indeed after all their care to conceal their crimes, they commonly leave some opening which leads to a discovery.—No superiority in rank, dignity, learning, or worldly wisdom; no sacredness of character and office, will preserve men from the most grovelling lusts, or even from the most stupid idolatries, when they are left to their own deceitful hearts: nay, superior persons are commonly the ringleaders and examples of every abomination to their inferiors, who follow them at a humble distance.—Those who grudge all expenses, and are soon wearied out, in the spiritual service of God, and who deem themselves degraded by it; often grudge no expense, labour, or debasement, in following their own idolatries and superstitions. For true religion is contrary to their pride and lusts; but their own inventions consist with the indulgence of their several inclinations: and therefore we need not wonder, that they turn their backs on the service of God to keep human traditions, or “turn away their ears from the truth and are turned unto fables.” Thus idolatry and false religion, as well as impiety, are connected with violence, oppression, and immorality. Therefore the Lord will “deal with them in fury and without pity:” and all his judgments on nations and churches are only earnest of his final wrath on “the workers of iniquity;” when they will indeed “cry unto him with a loud voice, but he will not hear them;” and when they will plainly appear to have merited their dreadful condemnation. For, if some, who make a fair shew in the house of God, could be followed to their secret chambers, they would be found committing the most abominable crimes: many, whose exterior is decent, have the chambers of their imagination continually occupied by licentious thoughts, in which they delight, and thus gratify their hateful passions with ideal indulgences: many, who have for a time been restrained by natural modesty and regard to character, have afterwards openly manifested their secret inclinations; when, occasion being given them, they have run into the greatest excesses. In short, the more we know of ourselves and of human nature, the more and greater abominations shall we discover: (Note, Jer. xvii. 9, 10:) and the longer the enlightened believer, who is enabled to walk most uprightly before God, and most blamelessly before men, examines himself and searches his heart; the more will he loathe and humble himself before God, and the more will he value “the Fountain opened for sin and for uncleanness,” and daily will he purify in it his polluted soul. Thus shall he be made whiter than snow: but “how will they escape” who live and die neglecting “so great salvation?” (Note, Heb. ii. 1—4.)

NOTES

CHAP. IX. V. 1, 2. The same person, who before appeared in vision and spake to the prophet, seems here in his hearing to have “cried with a loud voice” to those who had the charge over the city, to draw near. (Marg. Ref. a, b.—Notes, viii. 1—6.) Accordingly, six men came into the city from the north, each of them with a destroying weapon in his hand. Some understand by these six persons, the angels, who before had been employed to protect Jerusalem, and were now commissioned to be her destroyers. But, as there was no miraculous interposition in these divine judgments, it seems more obvious to consider them as representing the Chaldean army, or its six chief captains, who had a charge or commission against Jerusalem. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. c—e.—Notes, Is. x. 5—7. Jer. xxv. 8—10. li. 20—24.) With them there appeared one clothed with linen, the attire of a priest and not of a soldier, with an inkhorn by his side. Many interpreters explain this to mean Christ, our High Priest and King, who presides over all the desolations on earth, in order to preserve his chosen people; and who seals them by his Spirit, and writes their names in his book of life. But if this were “the Word,” and “Son of God,” how shall we interpret “the likeness of the appearance of a “man” upon the throne, from whence these orders were issued? (Notes, i. 24—26. viii. 2—4.) It seems therefore more agreeable to the context, to suppose that Christ the King of Israel, from the throne, gave these orders; and that “the man with the inkhorn” represented an angel, or the angels, who were employed to protect the pious remnant of the Jews from the Chaldeans: and his priestly garment might denote, that their preservation was owing to the priesthood and sacrifice of him who was to come. (Note, Rev. xv. 5—8.) These persons went into the court of the temple, and stood beside the brazen altar. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. e, f.) ‘To denote that the men, ordained to destruction, were offered up as so many sacrifices, to make an atonement to God’s justice. The destruction of the wicked is elsewhere expressed by the name of a sacrifice. (xxxix. 17. Is. ... xxxiv. 6.)’ Lowth.

V. 3, 4. “The glory of the God of Israel,” here mentioned, might either be the visible glory, which appeared in the holy of holies, above the ark, between the cherubim, and which the prophet saw removed from that situation, to the entrance of the door of the sanctuary; or that glory, which he had seen in the visions of God, and which represented that token of the Lord’s gracious presence with Israel. (Notes, i. 26—28. Ex. xl. 34, 35.)—‘The word ‘Cherub stands for Cherubim, as x. 2—4.’ Lowth. (Note, x. 1, 2.) This denoted, that the Lord was about to leave his place, his mercy-seat; to denounce judgment on the people as from his tribunal; to withdraw from his temple and from Jerusalem; and to give them up to the profanations and ravages of their enemies. (Marg. Ref. g.—Notes, x. 18, 19. xi. 22—25. Hos. v. 15.)—From this glory the Lord addressed the man “clothed in linen, who had the “inkhorn,” and ordered him to go through the city, and to set a mark upon the forehead of every one, who sighed continually, and earnestly protested against the abominable idolatries and iniquities which were there perpetrated. The forehead seems to have been mentioned, as the most conspicuous place in which a mark could be placed. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. h.—Note, Rev. vii. 1—3.) It might be supposed that they, who deeply lamented the abominations committed in Jerusalem, to the dishonour of God and the ruin of religion, either had not committed such crimes, or had repented of them: they were decidedly on the Lord’s part; they would have prevented by their examples, prayers, and endeavours, the prevalence of wickedness, if they could, and were distressed that they could not. All pious persons at that crisis, no doubt, were deeply grieved to see the holy city and temple so horribly polluted. This would therefore take in all who feared God, in whatever station they were placed, or however feeble their gracious dispositions were; and it would exclude all others.—‘When the number of such mourners ‘is not sufficient to divert God’s judgments from a nation, ‘they shall at least deliver their own souls.’ Lowth. (Notes, 2 Kings xxii. 15—20, v. 19. Ps. cxix. 136. Jer. xlii. 15—17. xxxvi. 19—25, vv. 23, 24. Luke xix. 41—44. Rom. ix. 1—3. 2 Cor. xii. 20, 21. 2 Pet. ii. 4—9, v. 8.)

He called to the man. (3) ‘The second person in the sacred Trinity gave his commands to the angel before mentioned’ (2).—Mark. (4) ‘This alludes to the custom of ‘the eastern nations, to mark their servants in the forehead.’ Lowth. (Note, 1, 2.)—A general opinion long prevailed, which the original was thought to favour, that the letter Thau was the mark here intended; and great disputes have taken place, whether in the Samaritan characters, which are supposed to have been at that time used by the Jews, that letter was, or was not, made in the form of a cross. These disputes, however, only shew how early this use of the form of the cross prevailed in the Christian Church, which made way for the superstition and idolatry of the Papists and many others in that particular. It may be supposed, that the vision in the Revelation made to the apostle John, had some reference to this of Ezekiel; yet no mention is there made of the form of a cross; which would hardly have been omitted, if it had been used on that occasion. (Rev. vii. 2, 3.)—Indeed it is obvious, that, in general, the less humble, believing regard has been paid to the doctrine of the cross, and to the propitiatory sacrifice offered by the crucified Emmanuel; the greater veneration has been rendered to the external form. This began to be introduced, when the simplicity of the gospel had become greatly corrupted; it was at its height a short time before the reformation; and it began to decline in many countries, when the doctrines of the gospel became more generally understood and believed. (Note, 2 Kings xviii. 4.)

V. 5—7. The Lord next commanded the executioners of his vengeance, to follow “the man with the inkhorn,” and to slay, without mercy or distinction, even “to utter destruction,” all whom they met: only they might not come near, either to hurt or affright, any of those who were marked in the forehead. This foretold the merciless carnage, which the Chaldeans would make of the ungodly Jews; (Marg. and Marg. Ref. i, k.—Notes, 2 Chr. xxxvi. 16, 17;) and the gracious protection afforded to the few pious servants of God among them. Thus Jeremiah, Baruch, Ebed-melech, and doubtless others, were preserved. (Marg. Ref. l.—Notes, Jer. xxxix. 11—18. xlv. 4, 5.)—The destroyers were also directed to begin at the sanctuary: and, lest they should hesitate to shed blood, and throw the dead carcasses, in the courts and sanctuary of God, they were expressly ordered thus to defile them; for this act of signal justice, though a ceremonial defilement, was indeed a moral purification of the temple. (Marg. Ref. m—o.—Notes, vii. 20—22. Ps. lxxiv. 4—6. Luke xiii. 1—3.) Then the prophet saw them begin the slaughter with the elders who were before the house; either the seventy elders whom he had seen burning incense, or the twenty-five men that were worshipping the sun: (Notes, viii. 7—12. 16:) and then they went forth to make similar destruction in the city.—The reference of the apostle Peter to this passage, seems to intimate, that the second destruction of the city and temple by the Romans, was also intended by the Spirit of prophecy. (Note, 1 Pet. iv. 17—19.)

V. 8—11. The prophet, in vision, beholding the destruction made of his people, whilst he was mercifully spared, and left alone, as it seems, of all who were in the court of the temple, was greatly affected; and in humble adoration enquired of the Lord, whether he meant to cut off all the residue of Israel, in thus “pouring out his wrath upon Jerusalem.” The ten tribes had been entirely destroyed or dispersed; only a remnant of Judah remained; and they seemed about to be utterly cut off. (Marg. Ref. p, q.—Notes, Ex. xxxii. 7—14. Num. xiv. 5. 11—19. xvi. 45—50. Jer. xiv. 10—18.) By this he intended to plead for a mitigation of the sentence, as the honour of God in his promises seemed to be concerned: but the Lord informed him, that the excessive wickedness of both Judah and Israel rendered this severity indispensably needful: the land had been filled with murder, as well as with idolatry; Jerusalem was full of obstinate and perverse wickedness, the fruit of the most desperate impiety and infidelity; and therefore the Lord was determined to shew no mercy to the nation in general, though he had reserved a small remnant for himself, as the seed of his future church. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. r—x.—Notes, viii. 7—17.)—In the mean time the man with the inkhorn reported the performance of the divine command: by which it appears, that he presided over and directed those, who executed the vengeance of God on the Jews; as well as “marked his servants in the forehead.” (Marg. and Marg. Ref. y.—Notes, 1, 2. x. 1, 2.)

people, and his power and presence no longer attend his ordinances; the form will seldom continue long, and the signal for his vengeance will commonly be given. But he departs reluctantly and gradually from those who have been long favoured with his presence; and his faithful servants readily perceive the tokens of the awful change. These are the most valuable friends and guardians of nations: and even when they are so few that the Lord will not spare communities in answer to their prayers, he will render his most terrible judgments harmless as to them. He has set “his mark upon their forehead,” and “all things shall work together for their good.” In times of prevailing wickedness they may be distinguished by their lamenting over those crimes which others palliate and excuse, and by bearing their testimony against them. Their zeal for the honour of God, and love to his cause, their compassion for souls, their hatred of sin, and their spiritual-mindedness, will not suffer them to be unconcerned spectators of impiety and iniquity. Their “righteous souls must needs be vexed day by day,” with seeing and hearing the works and words of ungodly men. Their prayers, examples, and endeavours are opposed to the impetuous torrent: and when they fail to stop its progress, they are deeply grieved and greatly alarmed. They mourn before God to see religion despised and trampled under foot, souls deceived, and Satan and his servants triumphing: and though spiritual consolations reconcile them to their situation for the time; yet they often desire to leave a world, where iniquity so much abounds. They especially lament the abominations committed within the church, because these are peculiarly dishonourable to God and destructive to the souls of men. Such persons are the friends of God, and shall be preserved for ever: if it be good for them, their lives shall be spared amidst desolating judgments; or they shall be previously taken from the evil to come; or the calamities, which cut off others in their sins, shall safely transmit their souls to heaven. (Note, Matt. 24.) But they, who mourn neither for their own sins, nor the sins of others, must expect no mercy: nor can any be looked on as the servants of God, who are indifferent to his cause, and unconcerned at the abominations which are committed against him.—In temporal calamities even infants are often involved in the common destruction: in the eternal punishment of the wicked, no discrimination will be regarded, except with reference to degrees of guilt: and in this respect, those who have been nearest to God by profession, privilege, or office, will be most severely punished.—If we be saved while others perish, we must ascribe the difference wholly to the mercy of our God; for we too have deserved wrath: and we should still continue to plead in behalf of our fellow sinners, for the remnant of the church, and for the continuance and revival of religion upon earth.—But indeed the wickedness of man is great, and deserves severe vengeance: even where the Lord shews no mercy, he does no injustice; as he only recompenses men’s ways on their heads: and his commands will certainly be executed, both for the salvation of his people, and the destruction of his enemies.

NOTES.

CHAP. X. V. 1, 2. The “living creatures,” which were before described, (Note, i. 5—14.) are here called “cherubim.” The cherubim which covered the mercy-seat, and that were placed in the holy of holies, or were figured upon different parts of the tabernacle and temple, were evidently emblematic of the holy angels, as fellow-worshippers of the God of Israel: and the same seems to be the meaning of the word in every other passage of scripture. (Notes, Gen. iii. 22—24. Ex. xxv. 10—22. 2 Sam. xxii. 7—16, v. 11. 1 Kings vi. 23—28. viii. 7—9. Ps. lxxx. 1.) From the great similarity between the living creatures in the visions of Ezekiel, and of those in that of St. John, (Notes, Rev. iv. 6—8.) commentators have generally concluded, that they must be coincident. Hence many have explained the living creatures in St. John’s vision of the holy angels: but their joining in the song, “Thou hast redeemed us to God with thy blood,” forms an insuperable objection. Hence others perceiving, that the ministers and churches of Christ must be meant in St. John’s vision, have interpreted Ezekiel’s cherubim and wheels of the same: yet the latter is not a prophecy of what would come to pass under the Christian dispensation, but a representation of what was about to take place at Jerusalem. No good reason can be given, why the two visions should mean precisely the same thing: angels as employed in God’s providential government of the world, and faithful ministers, as employed in the affairs of the church, may well be supposed, in different degrees, endued with the same gifts and actuated by similar principles; and therefore capable of being represented by the same emblems, or hieroglyphicks: for doubtless the former are, what the latter ought to be and would be. Nor should it be overlooked, that the cherubim had “every one four faces apiece” (21); while St. John’s living creatures had the same faces divided among them. The wheels in Ezekiel are totally different from the twenty four elders in St. John, and admit of, nay require, a different explanation. (Marg. Ref. a—d.—Note, i. 15—25.)—As therefore the whole of these visions and the context direct our thoughts to the dealings of God with the Jewish nation, especially in the destruction of the city and temple by the Chaldeans, and afterwards by the Romans; as the cherubim in the scripture, generally at least, denote angels; and as wheels are a far apter emblem of the course of providence, than of any thing in the constitution of the Christian church; insomuch that the heathen painted fortune, (which we consider as the secret appointment of God,) with a wheel, the emblem of the same vicissitudes of human affairs; the interpretation already given seems far more consistent with the scope of the passage, and more satisfactory than that referred to.—The prophet saw above the cherubim, as he had done before, (Notes, i. 26—28. viii. 2—4. ix. 3, 4,) “the appearance of the likeness of a throne,” and doubtless “as the appearance of the likeness of a man” upon it; and “he spake unto the man clothed with linen,” who had been employed in marking the servants of God in the forehead; and ordered him to go in between the wheels, under the cherub, (for one was connected with each of the wheels,) and thence to take burning coals, and scatter them over the city. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. e—h.—Notes, ix. 1, 2. 8—11, v. 11.) Thus the burning of Jerusalem, as well as the slaughter of its inhabitants, was emblematically predicted.—We suppose him, who sat upon the throne, to have been the eternal Son of God, the second person in the sacred Trinity; and the vision to represent his glory as “the King of Israel,” appearing from above the mercy-seat: the fire therefore from between the wheels, under the cherubim, seems to have signified the wrath of God to be executed by the Chaldeans upon Jerusalem, for their contempt of his mercy, their abuse of his favours, their profanation of his ordinances and temple, the wickedness of the priests, and their murder of the prophets. (Note, Rev. viii. 1—6, v. 5.)

V. 3—7. The cherubim stood on the right side of the temple, which is generally supposed to mean the north side: this might point out the quarter, from whence destruction would come. The inner court also was filled with the cloud. The Lord had taken possession of his temple by this appearance; (Notes, Ex. xl. 34—38. Lev. xvi. 2. 1 Kings viii. 10—14. 2 Chr. v. 12, 13;) and he thus intimated that he was now about to withdraw from it. At the same time the visible glory removed to the threshold of the house; (Notes, 18, 19. ix. 3, 4;) and then the court was “filled with brightness,” perhaps illuminating the cloud. Some think that it was the outer court which was filled with brightness, whilst the inner was filled with the dark cloud; denoting, that the Lord would leave the Jews in darkness, and send his light unto the Gentiles. At the same time the sound of the cherubim's wings was heard without, “as the voice of the almighty God when he speaketh:” i. e. like the sound of most tremendous thunder, or like the voice heard from mount Sinai when the law was given: (Marg. Ref. o.—Note, i. 15—25. v. 24;) which might intimate their triumphant admiration of the glorious justice and holiness of God in these awful dispensations; or the report that would be made of them to distant nations.—Accordingly when the man clothed in linen proceeded to execute his commission, one of the cherubim handed to him the fire, and he took it and went out, prepared to scatter it over the city; and this may denote, that the holy angels concur with each other in executing the divine mandates, whether of mercy or of judgment. V. 12. This circumstance, as it related to the living creatures, was not before mentioned: by the living creatures, as well as the wheels, (i. 18,) being full of eyes in every part, their constant watchfulness, and their penetration, sagacity, and circumspection may be denoted, (Note, Rev. iv. 6—8.) 'The wheels ... were full of eyes round about; to shew, that, however the course and event of things seem so unstable and uncertain, as if all ran upon wheels; and there does also appear a certain intricacy and perplexity in the proceedings thereof: yet that the infinite and most wise providence of God hath foreseen and fore-ordained all things to his own holy purposes.' Bp. Hall.

V. 13. O Wheel.] (Marg.) 'Or, "Move round." ... Lowth.—If our translation be retained; the all to the four wheels as one, may denote the unity of design and operation, which form the innumerable dispensations of Providence, into one grand and consistent plan.

V. 14. Some have concluded from this verse, that the same faces were also marked upon the wheels; but it seems rather to be meant of the living creatures.—"The face of a cherub," being here substituted for that of an ox, in the former vision; (i. 10;) it is generally thought that the cherubim in the temple were delineated with the countenances of oxen: yet the oxen and the cherubim are separately mentioned in one place. (1 Kings vii. 29.) If, however, this was the case, the hieroglyphical meaning alone should be attended to. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 18, 19. The glory of the LORD, departing from the threshold of the temple, removed to a greater distance, and rested above the cherubim: and they lifted up their wings, mounted with the wheels from the earth, and abode over the east gate of the temple, as about entirely to remove from it. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xi. 22—25, v. 23. xliii. 2—5.)

V. 20—22. Marg. Ref.—Notes, 14. i. 5—14.—I knew, &c. (20) The prophet now perceived that these living creatures had the same likeness in many respects, as he had seen of the cherubim at the temple, upon the walls, and doors of it: (Notes, 1 Kings vi. 31—35. vii. 23—39, v. 36:) for he could not have seen the cherubim in the most holy place, into which none but the high priest might enter.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The holy angels, who watch over and minister to the saints of God, are often employed as the executioners of his vengeance on hypocrites, and the enemies of his church. (Notes, Acts xii. 5—11. 20—23, v. 23.)—Our God, from his mercy-seat between the cherubim, is "a consuming Fire" to all who despise his great salvation: (Notes, Heb. xii. 22—29, vv. 25 29:) and his severest judgments will fall on those who abuse peculiar privileges, and are emboldened in their crimes by his patience and mercy.—Those awful dispensations, which excite the blasphemous objections and complaints of ungodly men, are viewed by holy angels as bright displays of the divine glory, and are celebrated with loud acclamations of praise and adoration. (Notes, Rev. xvi. 3—7. xix. 1—6.) The terror of JEHOVAH's justice and holiness, and the examples of his indignation against his rebellious creatures, do not in the least interrupt their confidence, joy, and love: nor would they disquiet those, whom Jesus has “delivered from the wrath to come;” were it not for the weakness of their faith; and the prevalence of their sins, which obscure the evidence of their reconciliation to God, and weaken their confidence, and interrupt the comfort of their communion with him. Otherwise, what should Christians fear? All judgment is administered by him “who loved them and gave himself for them, to redeem them to God with his blood;” he is “Head over all things to his church,” and all the angels are his ministering servants for their benefit. Let us then “give diligence to make our calling and election sure;” and, in our several stations, as ministers, or private Christians, let us copy the example of the holy angels, and walk circumspectly and intelligently; obey with promptitude and alacrity; and give up ourselves to be “led by the Spirit” of God, and disposed of in his providence, as he sees good. He will assuredly order every thing in perfect wisdom, truth, and love: we need fear nothing but hypocrisy, coming short of his grace, grieving the Holy Spirit, or dishonouring the gospel.—As the departure of God from churches or nations must prove their ruin; so his departure, for a time and in part, from a believer who has offended him, must occasion great distress and anguish, and sometimes cause him to say, “The pains of hell have got hold of me.” What then will be the case of those, to whom the righteous Judge shall at last say, “Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels?” Let this consideration warn sinners “to seek the LORD, while he may be found, and to call on him, while he is near;” and also excite us all to walk watchfully and humbly with our God.

12—15. viii. 2—4.) The prophet was next shewn some of the ring-leaders in wickedness. He saw twenty-five men at the east-gate of the temple: but it is uncertain whether they were the twenty-five men before-mentioned; (Note, viii. 16;) as they were not worshipping idols, but consulting about publick affairs. Whether they belonged to the sanhedrim, or great council of the nation, or not; they were princes or nobles, who had great influence in the measures of government. Some writers inform us, that Jerusalem was divided into twenty-four districts, over each of which there was a prince, or president, and one that was over them all was the ruler of the city.—Among these princes the prophet distinguished two, who seem to have been the most eminent: and the Lord informed him, that this company, especially the two mentioned by name, (Notes, 13. viii. 7—12, v. 11,) were the persons who devised mischief and gave evil counsel in the city. Probably, they encouraged idolatry, countenanced the false prophets, and persecuted the true prophets. They counselled the revolt from the Chaldeans, the alliance with Egypt, and the pertinacious opposition to the besiegers, in defiance of the warnings and predictions of God, by Jeremiah and other prophets. They persuaded the people, that if there were any truth in the predictions of divine judgments on the city and land, they would not be fulfilled for a long time; that they might build houses, and attend to their temporal concerns, without any apprehensions. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. f. g.—Notes, xii. 21—25. Is. v. 18, 19. Am. vi. 3—8. 2 Pet. iii. 1—4.) And in derision of Jeremiah's vision of a seething pot, (Notes, xxiv. 3—14. Jer. i. 13, 14,) they added that “they were the flesh” in this pot, or caldron; the walls of the city would protect them against the Chaldeans as the caldron keeps the fire from the flesh that is in it; and if any attempted to take them out, it would be at their peril. Thus they taught the people to harden themselves in rebellion against God.—“This is a proverb which means, ‘We will share all fate with her, we will either be preserved or perish with her.’ Michaelis.”

V. 4—12. Under the immediate impulse of the Holy Spirit, the prophet in vision seemed to himself to deliver the following message to these counsellors of rebellion and this, being afterwards written and published, would come to their knowledge. (Marg. Ref. i, k.) He first reminded them of the wicked words which they had spoken

Thus saith the LORD, ^m Thus have ye said, O house of Israel: ⁿ for I know the things that come into your mind, every one of them.

6 Ye have ^o multiplied your slain in this city, and ye have filled the streets thereof with the slain.

7 Therefore thus saith the Lord God, ^p Your slain whom ye have laid in the midst of it, they are the flesh, and this city is the caldron; ^q but I will bring you forth out of the midst of it.

8 Ye ^r have feared the sword; and I will bring a sword upon you, saith the Lord God.

9 And I will bring you out of the midst thereof, ^s and deliver you into the hands of strangers, ^t and will execute judgments among you.

10 Ye shall ^u fall by the sword; I will judge you in ^v the border of Israel; and ye shall know that I am the LORD.

11 This ^w city shall not be your caldron, neither shall ye be the flesh in the midst thereof; ^x but I will judge you in the border of Israel:

12 And ye shall know that I am the LORD: ^y for ye have not walked in my statutes, neither executed my judgments, ^z but have done after the manners of the heathen that are round about you.

13 ¶ And it came to pass, ^b when I prophesied, that Pelatiah the son of Benaiah died. ^c Then fell I down upon my face, and cried with a loud voice, and said, ^d Ah Lord God! wilt thou make a full end of the remnant of Israel?

14 ¶ Again the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,

15 Son of man ^e thy brethren, even thy brethren, the men of thy kindred, and all the house of Israel wholly, are they unto whom the inhabitants of Jerusalem have said, ^f Get ye far from the LORD: ^g unto us is this land given in possession.

16 Therefore say, ^h Thus saith the Lord God; Although I have cast them far off among the heathen, and although I have scattered them among the countries, yet will I be to them ⁱ as a little sanctuary in the countries where they shall come.

as above stated (3); and assured them that the Lord was exactly acquainted with all their secret thoughts, counsels, and designs, their vain hopes and rebellious devices. (Marg. Ref. l—n.—Notes, xxxviii. 10. Ps. cxxxix. 2.) He next charged them both with shedding the blood of prophets and righteous men, by their oppressions and persecutions; and also with murdering all the Jews, who had been or would be slain in the war, in which they so obstinately persisted: so that they multiplied their slain in the streets of the city. (Marg. Ref. o, p.) The city was indeed a caldron; and those who perished by their fault, by the sword and famine during the siege, were the flesh that should continue and be consumed in it: but they themselves would be brought forth out of it. (Marg. Ref. q. z.—Notes, xxiv. 1—13.) They had feared being put to death, if they surrendered to the Chaldeans, and had therefore determined to stand out to the last extremity; and thus they should be slain by the sword: (Note, Prov. x. 24:) the Lord would deliver them into the hand of the Chaldeans, and by the hands of these “strangers” execute his judgments upon them; for Nebuchadnezzar would put them to death as criminals, at Riblah “in the border of Israel.” (Marg. Ref. r—y.—Notes, 2 Kings xxv. 18—21. Jer. xxxix. 1—10, v. 5.) Then it would appear that the city was not their caldron, and that they were not able to continue in it: seeing they had obstinately refused to obey the Lord, and had copied the idolatries and iniquities of all the surrounding nations.

V. 13. Whilst the prophet, in vision, was delivering this message to the princes, Pelatiah suddenly died. It is probable, that he was actually cut off by some terrible death at Jerusalem, at this time, or afterwards when the prophecy was fulfilling; and in so remarkable a manner, as would render the vision much noticed. But when the prophet witnessed this accomplishment of God’s word, as one who had the welfare of his people nearer his heart than his own character, he was greatly alarmed and distressed, and renewed his enquiries, whether the Lord meant to destroy all the remnant of his people Israel. (Marg. Ref.—Note, ix. 8—11.)

V. 14—16. The Lord was graciously pleased to relieve the anxiety of his servant respecting his people Israel, by directing his attention to the Jews who were already in captivity. They were his brethren in distress, as well as in blood; and thus more nearly connected with him, than those in the land of Judah: especially as he was raised up to prophesy among them. Nay, the dispersed Israelites were more the objects of the Lord’s special favour, than the inhabitants of Jerusalem were. (Notes and P. O. Jer. xxiv. Indeed the latter treated the captives with disdain: they imagined that God had rejected them, and sent them into captivity as the greater sinners: or that their surrender to the Chaldeans was a forfeiture of their privileges, and even of their estates: they meant therefore to excommunicate and disinherit them, and to appropriate the city and land

17 Therefore say, Thus saith the Lord God, ^k I will even gather you from the people, and assemble you out of the countries where ye have been scattered, and I will give you the land of Israel.

18 And they shall come thither, and they shall take away all the detestable things thereof, and all the abominations thereof from thence.

19 And ^m I will give them one heart, and ⁿ I will put a new spirit within you; ^o and I will take the stony heart out of their flesh, and will give them an heart of flesh.

to themselves. (Notes, xxxiii. 24—29. Is. lxxv. 3—7, v. 5. lxvi. 5, 6.) But the Lord had far other intentions: he had sent some of the people into captivity in order to their reformation; and though they were scattered among the Gentiles at a great distance from the temple; yet he “would be as a little Sanctuary” unto them in every place. (Marg. Ref. h, i.—Notes, Ps. xxxi. 19, 20, xc. 1, 2. xci. 1, 2. cxli. 1, 2. Mal. i. 9—11, v. 11. Matt. xviii. 19, 20.) He would be their Protector and Support; he would answer their prayers, and give them the comfort of his presence; and when two or three of them met together, in a synagogue or a private house, their worship should be as acceptable, as if they had sacrificed at the temple: so that whilst the Jews at Jerusalem possessed many external religious advantages, without the power and presence of God, because of their pride and hypocrisy; those in captivity among the Gentiles should have his presence and power with them, being enabled to exercise humble faith, and to worship him in spirit and truth. (Notes, Dan. vi. 10, 11. ix. 1—20.) This would be “as a little Sanctuary” in every place, a refuge to a few people, which would not excite either the jealousy or rapacity of their enemies, as the magnificent temple at Jerusalem had done. (Note, Is. viii. 11—15.)—‘As a sanctuary for a short time.’ Bp. Newcombe.—Such a promise evidently implied the future introduction of a new and more spiritual dispensation, when men should worship God with acceptance in every place. (Note, John iv. 21—24.) But as this “little Sanctuary” must, as it were, be entered by faith in Jesus Christ, the Door and the Way: (Notes, John x. 6—9. xiv. 4—6, v. 6:) so the Jews in their present dispersions have not the benefit of it, because of their unbelief; which renders their present dispersion unspeakably more dreadful than the Babylonish captivity.

V. 17—20. The Lord further promised to the captives, that they, or their posterity, should be restored to their own land; and become decidedly set against idolatry and all other abominable wickedness. (Marg. Ref. k, l.—Note, xxxvi. 20—24.) Few of them seem at the time when this message was sent to them, to have been true believers: but God engaged to prepare them for the blessings which he intended for them, by “giving them one heart, and “by putting a new spirit within them.” The “one heart” may either mean, that oneness of judgment, disposition, and affection, which the grace of God produces in his people; or that singleness of heart which distinguishes them from others. (Marg. Ref. m.—Notes, Ps. lxxxvi. 11. Jer. xxiv. 7. xxxii. 39—41. Zeph. iii. 9, 10. Acts ii. 44—47. iv. 32—35.) The hearts of the Jews had been divided among different idols, and they had endeavoured to worship both JEHOVAH and their idols, to serve him and their sins: but this change would cause them to serve him singly, wholly, and devotedly, and to renounce all idols, rivals, and worldly lusts. “A new spirit” would also be given them, that is, a new temper and disposition; a new light in the understanding and direction to the judgment; new purity in their memories, imaginations, and affections; new desires, hopes, fears, joys, and sorrows; a new tenderness in the conscience, and submission in the will: the effect of the regenerating Spirit of God; for “that which is born of the Spirit is spirit;” altogether spiritual, according to the law, truth, and image of God; disposed to repentance, faith, love, conscientious obedience, and holy worship. (Marg. Ref. n.—Notes, xviii. 30—32. xxxvi. 25—27. Deut. xxix. 4. xxx. 1—10, v. 6. Ps. li. 10. Jer. xxxi. 31—34. Rom. xii. 1, 2. 2 Cor. v. 17.)—At the same time, the Lord would take away “the stony heart out of their flesh,” or from their corrupt nature: for “that which is born of the flesh is flesh,” carnal, and enmity to God. “The stony heart” denotes the natural insensibility, obduracy, and obstinacy of fallen man. The carnal heart, like a stone, cannot be made to feel. Judgments, mercies, warnings, examples, are alike unavailing. (Note, ix. 3, 4.) The terrors from mount Sinai, the love of Christ, and the sweet promises of the gospel, fail of producing suitable affections. Men live unconcerned amidst the dead and dying; yea, grow more and more hardened in times and places, where unusual mortality prevails: they accumulate loads of guilt like mountains, and are neither dismayed nor humbled: and they generally are as unfeeling to the miseries of others, as to their own danger. They are dead, insensible, and like a stone, which feels nothing from the hardest blow. But renewing grace creates a susceptibility of proper feeling in the soul and conscience: then a sinner learns to fear God, to stand in awe of his word, and to flee from his wrath. Then the mercies of God excite his gratitude, and the promises encourage his hope: he is humbled for his transgressions of the law; and unites love and gratitude with still deeper humiliation, by his knowledge of the gospel. Then his heart becomes broken, his conscience tender, his affections easily moved to fear or compassion: a wrong temper now causes him more pain than numerous gross crimes once did; and the consideration of the shortness and uncertainty of life produces, in some measure, its proper effect on his conduct. His heart becomes as living flesh, which feels the least touch, and is now capable of joy and sorrow from spiritual objects, which before it was not. This change the Lord alone can work, and he promised to do it for Israel, in order that they might “walk in his statutes;” for without it spiritual obedience and worship cannot be performed: and thus he would “be their God, and own them as his people.” (Marg. Ref. o—q.—See on Note, Jer. xxx. 22.)—This may be interpreted as a prophecy of the restoration of the Jews and some of the Israelites, to their own land: it is also applicable in its largest sense to the true Israel, the elect of God, who all partake of this blessing in due season: but it especially foretels the future conversion of Israel, and their restoration to their own land. (Notes, xxxiv. 23—31. xxxvii. 23—28. xxxix. 23—29. Hos. iii. 4, 5. Amos ix. 13—15. Mic. vii. 11—13.)—“These promises chiefly relate to the general conversion of the Jews, when God shall pour out upon them the Spirit of grace. ... (Zech. xii. 10.) ... Conversion is commonly spoken of in scripture, as if it were a new creation, because of the new dispositions and powers which accompany it.” Lowth.

V. 21. The hearts of almost all the Jews in Jerusalem and Judah, and of numbers among the captives, “walked after the heart of their detestable things.” Their affections were habitually fixed upon idols: they were disposed to copy the licentiousness, cruelty, and fraud, which these supposed deities were represented as delighting in; and they loved their gross and carnal worship. Or, they took as much pleasure in serving Satan, (who was worshipped under the names and forms of all their idols,) as he did in receiving their adoration. But none of those who continued to act in this manner, could have any interest in these promises: on the contrary, they would be recompensed according to their own ways, notwithstanding the mercies reserved for the penitent.—“The prophet mentions the heart of their detestable things, ... because evil spirits, who were worshipped in and by them, were pleased with the devotions in that manner paid to them.” Lowth. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 22—25. After the prophet had received all this information; he saw the cherubim and the wheels, with the glory of God above them, remove to a greater distance: they had before left the temple, and now they departed from the city eastward to the mount of Olives; the place from which Christ, the glory of the second temple, ascended into heaven, previously to its destruction. (Notes, ix. 4. x. 18, 19. xliii. 2—5. Hag. ii. 6—9. Zech. xiv. 4, 5. Luke xxiv. 50—53. Acts i. 9—12.)—Then the prophet was, in vision, brought back into Chaldea, in the same way that he had been conveyed thence: the vision left him, his ecstasy terminated, and he found himself among the elders where he was at first. (Note, viii. 2—4.) Afterwards he reported to them and the other captives all that he had seen and heard in this vision: (viii—xi:) and perhaps he also now explained the other signs, which he had before shewn to them. (Notes, iv—vii.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13.

When those, who are eminent in rank or abilities, are destitute of the fear of God, and oppose or ridicule his truths and warnings, they are qualified to be extensively mischievous. Being ingenious in devising evil, plausible in counselling and vindicating it, and bold in carrying it into execution; they encourage numbers to harden themselves in rebellion against God, and to adopt and persist in the most pernicious and impious designs. But they should be reminded, that they must render an account to him, for all the mischief done by their influence; for all the blood shed in unjust and unnecessary wars, which their worldly policy has occasioned; and for all the murder, that takes place in consequence of their oppression, persecution, and unrighteous decrees. How awfully do some men of this description “multiply their slain,” not only through the streets of a single city, or the districts of a kingdom, but through whole continents, nay, in every quarter of the globe! and they will at length be as much distinguished by their punishment, as they now are by their crimes. But carnal policy is connected with infidelity: and such persons turn the oracles of God into ridicule, and persuade themselves and others, that no evil shall happen unto them. If they cannot entirely shake off all regard to revelation, they conclude, that the wrath of God denounced against transgressors is doubtful, or at least distant; and that they may safely indulge their inclinations, and pursue their rebellious schemes, for some time longer; that they have many years of life before them; and that they shall be able to take care of their souls at last. The love of the world, and dislike to religion, give Satan and his factors an amazing advantage against men, in tempting them to this procrastination: and thus they seduce and ruin one another, until at length, when “they are crying, Peace, peace, sudden destruction cometh upon them, and they shall not escape.” (Notes, Dan. v. 1—9. Luke xii. 15—21. xvi. 19—31. Acts xii. 20—23. 1 Thes. v. 1—3.) We should, therefore, plainly protest against these devisers of mischief, and wicked counsellors: we should shew them the folly and impiety of their words, and remind them that God knows all their thoughts and contrivances. We should also meditate on the same truths, with reference to ourselves; that we may watch our hearts and lips, and earnestly pray to our God to ex-

CHAP. XII.

Ezekiel is ordered, by removing his goods, and breaking through the wall of his house, to give the people a sign of the taking of Jerusalem, of Zedekiah's flight, and of the captivity of the Jews, 1—16; by eating and drinking with trembling and anxiety, to prefigure the famine, and the consternation of the Jews during the siege, 17—20; and to declare that this ruin was near at hand; as a rebuke to those who profanely spake of it as distant, 21—28.

THE word of the LORD also came unto me, saying, amine and keep them for us.—The worst fears of ungodly men will come upon them, and often by those sinful means which they use to secure themselves: and when sinners fear the sword of man more than the wrath of God, he will sometimes expose them to both; and execute his judgments upon them in this world as well as in the next. Thus he often singles out the ringleaders in impiety, infidelity, and wickedness, and renders them warnings to others, that they may repent and avoid such destructive paths. (Num. xiv. 36—38. Notes, Num. xvi. 28—34. Jer. xxviii. 15—17. xxix. 21—23.) But while these awful dispensations verify the words of God's faithful servants; they cannot but be deeply affected by them, and will still plead with him to have mercy on those who remain.

V. 14—25.

The Lord often reserves for himself those persons, of whom we had little hopes; and leaves to their own pride and lusts, such as we had better expectations of: while they, whom he afflicts and man despises, are commonly nearer the kingdom of heaven, than their more prosperous and self-confident neighbours.—Many are ready to imagine that they are exclusively the people of God, while others are gone far from him; when, in fact, they are idolizing some form or creed, and have no part or lot in the matter: and those who rejoice in the calamities of their brethren, because they expect gain from them, and who are ready to anathematize and injure them for conscience' sake, are strangers to "the power of godliness." But wherever the Lord casts the lot of those who truly fear him, he will be "a Sanctuary" unto them: they cannot be scattered to a distance from his protecting providence, from his throne of grace, from the consolations of his Spirit, or "communion with the Father and his Son Jesus Christ:" and he will gather into his heavenly kingdom, from every country under heaven, all those who have been delivered by his grace from their detestable things and abominations. But without "the one heart and the new spirit," which he bestows; except he take away the hard and stony heart, and give us the heart of flesh; we shall never truly repent, or believe and obey the Gospel. When the sinner feels his need of these blessings; let him bring these promises to the throne of grace, and present them as prayers in the name of Christ, and they will surely be performed. (Note, Acts v. 29—31.) Then sin will be loathed, the Saviour will become precious, the heart will be made humble and contrite, the conscience tender; and the converted sinner will be inclined and enabled to "walk in the statutes of God, and keep his ordinances and do them." (Notes, Tit. ii. 11—14.) Such are indeed the Lord's people, and he is their God and Portion: but they differ as much from notional professors of evangelical truths, as from Pharisaical despisers of them: and this sensibility of heart and conscience is the chief discrimination between the true Christian and all other men.—As for those, whose hearts are habitually set upon their idolatries and iniquities; they are evidently under the dominion and condemnation of their sins, and God will deal with them according to the covenant of works, and "recompense their ways upon their own heads." And though he will not forsake his people; yet he may be driven away from any part of his visible church, by the hypocrisy and iniquity of those, who are called by his name: and woe be to them, when he withdraws his presence, glory, and protection!—Finally, whatever ministers learn from the word or Spirit of God, whether concerning his judgments or his mercies, they must faithfully declare it to all the people, as far as they have opportunity afforded them.

NOTES.

CHAP. XII. V. 1—7. Ezekiel does not seem, for the present, to have had any more visions of the divine glory; but to have received revelations from God in the more ordinary manner of other prophets.—Even the captives, among whom he dwelt, were "a rebellious house" like their brethren in Judah; who would not use their senses and faculties, or avail themselves of the instructions of God's word and providence, for their advantage! (Marg. Ref. a, b.—Notes, Deut. xxix. 4. Is. vi. 9, 10. Jer. v. 20—25. Matt. xiii. 14—17. Mark viii. 17—21.) After all that they had heard and experienced, they still expected that Jerusalem would be preserved from the Chaldeans: they deemed themselves unhappy in bondage, and hoped to be speedily restored to their country: this led them to neglect the duties of their situation, to listen to false prophets, to reject the word of God, and thus to rebel both against his commandments and providence. (Notes, Jer. xxix. 4—15.) To certify them therefore of the vanity of their hopes, the prophet was ordered to make ready his furniture for removing to another habitation, in the sight of the people, and then to carry it, or some part of it, to a distant place; in hopes (speaking after the manner of men,) "that the people

4 Then shalt thou bring forth thy stuff by day in their sight, as stuff for removing: and thou shalt go forth^e at even in their sight, as^{*} they that go forth into captivity.

5[†] Dig thou through the wall in their sight, and carry out thereby.

6 In their sight shalt thou bear it upon thy shoulders, and carry it forth in the twilight: thou shalt^f cover thy face, that thou see not the ground:^g for I have set thee for a sign unto the house of Israel.

7 And^h I did so as I was commanded: ⁱI brought forth my stuff by day, as stuff for captivity, and in the even I[†] digged through the wall with mine hand; I brought it forth in the twilight, and I bare it upon my shoulder in their sight.

8 ¶ And in the morning came the word of the LORD unto me, saying,

9 Son of man, hath not the house of Israel,^k the rebellious house, said unto thee, ^lWhat doest thou?

10 Say thou unto them, Thus saith the Lord God; ^mThis burden concernethⁿ the prince in Jerusalem, and all the house of Israel that are among them.

11 Say, I am your sign: like as I have done, so shall it be done unto them: they shall^s remove and go into captivity.

12 And^o the prince that is among them shall bear upon his shoulder in the twilight, and shall go forth: they shall dig through the wall to carry out thereby: he shall cover his face, that he see not the ground with his eyes.

13 My^p net also will I spread upon him, and he shall be taken in my snare: ^qand I will bring him to Babylon to the land of the Chaldeans; yet shall he not see it, though he shall die there.

14 And^r I will scatter toward every wind all that are about him to help him, and all his bands; ^sand I will draw out the sword after them.

15 And^t they shall know that I am the LORD, when I shall scatter them among the nations, and disperse them in the countries.

16 But^u I will leave^v a few men of them from the sword, from the famine, and from the pestilence; ^wthat they may declare all their abominations among the heathen whither they come; ^xand they shall know that I am the LORD.

“would consider, though they were a rebellious house.” Thus he was directed to spend the day about his furniture, and in the evening to go forth as one afraid of being carried away captive: and to render his conduct more significant, he was ordered to dig or break through the wall of his house, and to go forth by that opening, carrying part of his property, or some provisions, with him, as desirous to escape the enemy; and to cover his face, not only as in distress, but to disguise himself for fear of being detected. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. c—g.) Having received these orders, he punctually obeyed them; and thus set before the eyes of the captive Jews the plundering of Jerusalem of all its treasures, and the removal of them and of the inhabitants to Babylon; the vain endeavours of the Jews to escape, and to carry off their property; and especially the conduct and fate of Zedekiah. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. i.—Note, 8—15.)

V. 8—15. Either the people had ridiculed the prophet’s conduct, or they had contemptuously disregarded it. (Marg. Ref. k, l.—Note, xx. 49.) He was therefore commanded to inform them, that “this burden,” or prophetick sign of impending judgments, respected Zedekiah, the prince in Jerusalem, “under whose shadow they hoped to live among the nations;” (Note, Lam. iv. 20;) as well as all those of the families of Israel, who yet remained in their own land. As Ezekiel had removed his furniture, and changed his habitation; so would their property and persons be removed into another land: and the king himself would flee from the conquerors in the dusk of the evening, with a burden on his shoulder, and a covering on his face, in order to disguise himself; whilst his attendants would break through the wall to forward his escape. But the Lord would spread his net for him, and take him in his snare; for the Chaldeans would overtake him, and carry him to Babylon; yet he should not see that city, though he would die there. (Marg. Ref. m—q.) Jeremiah had predicted, that his eyes should see the eyes of the king of Babylon; (Note, Jer. xxxiv. 1—5, v. 3;) and here Ezekiel foretold, that he should not see Babylon; and Josephus says that he thought these two prophecies inconsistent with each other, and therefore believed neither of them: yet both were exactly accomplished, when he was brought to Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah, and there had his eyes put out, and was then carried to Babylon. (Notes, xvii. 15—21. xxi. 25—27. 2 Kings xxv. 1—7.)—The Lord moreover declared, that all the Jews, who adhered to Zedekiah, and survived the taking of the city, should be scattered through the nations, and be pursued by his judgments: and by the accomplishment of these predictions, they should be convinced that he was the eternal JEHOVAH, the Creator and Lord of all. (Marg. Ref. r—t.)

V. 16. It was the purpose of God, to leave a remnant

17 ¶ Moreover the word of the LORD came to me, saying,

18 Son of man ^aeat thy bread with quaking, and drink thy water with trembling and with carefulness;

19 And say unto the people of the land, Thus saith the Lord God of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and of the land of Israel; They shall eat their bread ^awith carefulness, and drink their water with astonishment, ^bthat the land may be desolate from ^aall that is therein, ^cbecause of the violence of all them that dwell therein.

of the Jews, who should escape all the divers kinds of death which cut off the rest, and who might declare among the heathen all their abominations. Either the conduct of this remnant would be so very atrocious, that the heathen might see the reason of the Lord's dealings with them, by witnessing their abandoned wickedness; or, being brought to repentance, they would confess their abominable idolatries and iniquities, and acknowledge the justice of God in his severity towards them: that so the heathen also might be made acquainted with the power, truth, and holiness of Israel's God. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, vi. 8-10. xiv. 22, 23.)

V. 17-20. The Lord next directed the prophet to instruct the people by another sign. Whenever he ate or drank, he was required to act like a man in great terror and anxiety; as if he feared, that some one would rob him of his food, or as if he were eating his last meal, and must then perish by hunger and thirst. (Notes, iv. 9-17. Lev. xxvi. 25, 26. 1 Kings xvii. 10-16, v. 12.) This denoted, that the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and those who remained in the land, would soon endure far greater miseries, than their captive brethren had done: when they would, with astonishment, terror, and excruciating solicitude, perceive famine increasing upon them, and expect to have their scanty morsel taken from them by some other starving wretches, or to be slain while eating it; or that they must soon eat their last meal, and then die miserably by hunger. For the city and those parts of the land which were still inhabited, would surely and speedily be desolated, because of the violence, oppression, and impiety of the inhabitants. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.)

V. 21-25. Emboldened by the long-suffering of God, and despising the declarations of his prophets, the Jews, (both in captivity and in the land of Israel,) commonly used to say to each other, "The days are prolonged, and every vision faileth;" so that this became a proverb among them. (Marg. Ref. c, f.) They had been long threatened and were still spared; and they concluded that the visions of the prophets had failed. (Notes, 26-28. vii. 2-15. xi. 1-3. Is. v. 18, 19. Jer. v. 10-13. Am. v. 18-20. 2 Pet. iii. 1-4.) But the Lord assured them, that the event should speedily cause this impious proverb to cease: for the days were at hand, when every vision would take effect. Then the false prophets would be silenced and their lying divinations detected: for the Lord would speak by his prophets, and cause his word to be noticed by immediately performing it, in their days, and upon the very persons to whom it was spoken. (Marg. Ref. g-m.—Note Zech. i. 5, 6.)

V. 26-28. Perhaps, after the former message, the Jews altered their proverb; and instead of saying, "the vision failed," they only said, that it related to remote times and distant events. Or, this proverb was used at the same time, by such as did not openly avow their infidelity. The Lord, however, ordered his prophet to assure them, that the time of his patience was expiring, and that he would immediately fulfil his most alarming predictions.—This could not, at the most, be more than four or five years before the destruction of Jerusalem.—'My threatenings shall come to pass in your own days, and ye shall have ocular demonstration of their truth.' (Lowth) (Marg. Ref.)

CHAP. XIII.

Ezekiel is ordered to prophesy against the false prophets, 1—9; and to expose their folly and wickedness, and the fata. effects of their delusions, to others and themselves, under the emblem of a wall daubed with untempered mortar, and beaten down by a violent storm, 10—16; and against the prophetesses, who, by their signs and lying prognostications, encouraged the wicked in sin, and discouraged the righteous: and to predict their disgrace and ruin, 17—23.

AND the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS
V. 1—16.

It is often a painful trial to the faithful servants of God, that they are constrained to dwell among those, who are most rebellious against him.—Men have eyes, ears, and understandings; but, as fallen and apostate creatures, they are utterly destitute of a disposition to make a proper use of them, or of the advantages which they enjoy. This is the essence of their rebellion, and cannot possibly be allowed as an excuse for it: it counteracts all the endeavours of God's servants to instruct, convince, warn, or affect them; and it often discourages them from repeating the unsuccessful attempt. They should not, however, yield to despondency, but rather devise or adopt more and other methods of engaging the attention, convincing the judgment, or reaching the heart and conscience; "if God peradventure will give" sinners "repentance, to the acknowledging of the truth, and that they may recover themselves out of the snare of the devil, who are taken captive by him at his will:" (Note, 2 Tim. ii. 23—26:) for none can know but those may hereafter consider, who have been hitherto most rebellious. To this end, the minister must not shrink from any hardship or personal inconvenience, which can evince his own deep conviction of the truth and importance of his message; nor should he fear the ridicule or reproach, which he may incur in the performance of his duty. He should especially at all times speak and act, as a man who is deeply convinced, that "here he hath no continuing city," and who is continually preparing for a removal; who expects changes, disappointments, and difficulties, until that period arrives; and who is assured, that there can be "no peace for the wicked," in any place or station or rank in life.—He also should seek to have his answer ready, when called upon to explain the grounds of his hope, and the reasons of his conduct; (Note, 1 Pet. iii. 13—16;) that he may be able to speak pertinently and convincingly to the consciences of those who make enquiries.—The word of God concerns princes, as well as their subjects. Indeed in great national calamities, superior stations only expose men to more imminent perils, and more acute sufferings; and in the eternal world, they will expose ungodly men to the deeper condemnation.—The greatest princes will sometimes submit to extreme hardships and debasement, to save their lives: they will endure fatigue, appear disguised like the meanest of their subjects, and be glad to be mistaken for them: what then should we not be willing to venture, renounce, suffer, or stoop to, to save our souls "from the wrath to come!" This may certainly be effected by all, who diligently seek it in the way of the gospel: whereas men's most earnest endeavours to preserve their lives often prove ineffectual; or they are so taken in the Lord's net, that life is rendered as bitter, as death is dreadful.—While ringleaders in rebellion against God are singled out for punishment; such as concur with them will not escape: and either the open detection of crimes, or men's penitent confessions, will justify God before the whole world, in all the threatenings of his word, and in all the judgments which he inflicts.

V. 17—28.

Abused plenty generally ends in pinching want: and we may profitably meditate on the horrors of famine, when men grudge each other, and even themselves, every morsel, and behold with terror and anguish the speedy approach of more dreadful extremities: for we may thence learn to be thankful, moderate, and liberal, in our use of plenty; and the more to hate and dread sin, which thus forfeits or embitters all our comforts; and not only desolates cities and nations, but ruins the souls of unnumbered multitudes.—It is a grievous sign of deep degeneracy, when profane, infidel, and immoral speeches become proverbial: but the Lord notices them, and will call to account those who use them, and will at length put them to silence and shame.—"Because sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily, therefore the hearts of the sons of men are wholly set in them to do evil:" (Note, Ec. viii. 11—13:) but, however men may wilfully mistake reprieves for pardons, and the Lord's long-suffering for "the failure of the vision," the days are at hand when they will find every word of God to take effect. Then flattering teachers and infidels will be confuted and condemned; and the execution of his threatened vengeance will form an awful demonstration to them of the truth of the scriptures.

—‘The true prophets often denounce God’s judgments against the false ones; laying to their charge many mis- demeanors in their private conversation; and upbraiding them for unfaithfulness in the office they undertook, of guiding and directing men’s consciences.’ Lowth. (Notes, xxii. 25—28. xxxiv. 2—6. Is. ix. 13—17. lvi. 9—12. Jer. v. 30, 31. vi. 13—15. xiv. 13—16. xxiii. 9—32. Mic. iii. 5—12.)—Some of the false prophets lived in Judah, and others of them among the captives in Chaldea. (Notes, Jer. xxix.) They vaunted themselves to be “the prophets of Israel,” and were considered by many as such; but they were the ruin of the people who confided in them. Ezekiel was therefore required to prophesy against them; not so much in expectation of bringing them to repentance, as in order to undeceive those whom they deluded. They had the character of being very discerning men, and were no doubt proud of their wisdom: but they were “foolish prophets;” because they followed their own fancies, and had received no revelations from God, though they audaciously ventured to speak in his name. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. a—d.) Israel therefore must be informed, that their favourite prophets were “like the foxes in the deserts:” crafty, ravenous, and mischievous; always scheming something for their own interest, or shifting about to save themselves, without regard to the welfare of the people: thus they spoiled the Lord’s vineyard, and devoured his flock; as the foxes from the desert marred the vineyards, and did mischief in the sheep-folds of Canaan. (Marg. Ref. e.—Notes, Cant. ii. 15. 2 Cor. xi. 13—15.)—‘They seize their prey, in a cunning and cowardly manner; and then flee into lurking places.’ Bp. Newcombe.

V. 5. The wickedness of Israel had broken down the hedge of the divine protection, and opened a gap or breach at which their enemies might enter. And, as when such breaches are made in the walls of besieged cities, the officers and soldiers who defend them repair thither, and venture their lives in withstanding the foe, till the breach be built up again: so “the prophets of Israel” ought to have ventured all consequences, in endeavouring to bring the people to repentance; as well as to have opposed their prayers, examples, instructions, and their whole influence, against the prevalence of ungodliness and iniquity, and in using every means of averting the divine judgments which were coming upon them. But the false prophets attempted nothing of the kind: they neither sought to turn away the approaching calamities, nor to prepare the people for them; but rather encouraged them to harden themselves against God, who had declared that he was coming to fight against them by the Chaldeans. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, xxii. 30. Ps. cvi. 19—23. Is. lix. 16—19. Jer. xxi. 5—7. xxiii. 21, 22. Mal. i. 9—11.)

V. 6. The false prophets spoke with such confidence and plausibility, and their predictions so accorded to the desires and presumptuous confidence of the people, that they assuredly expected to see them accomplished. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xii. 21—28. 1 Kings xxii. 13, 14. Ps. cxix. 49. Jer. xxiii. 32. xxviii. 1—4.)

V. 7—9. (Marg. Ref. n—p.—Note, 6.) The indignation of God would fall especially upon the false prophets, whose covetous and carnal minds made them susceptible of strong impressions from the illusions of Satan: so that they first wilfully imposed on the people; and probably were afterwards judicially given up to strong delusions to believe their own lies, and to expect that the Jews would prosper in resisting the Chaldeans. (Notes, xiv. 9—11. 1 Kings xxii. 19—23. 2 Thes. ii. 8—12. 2 Tim. iii. 13.) Thus they “saw vanity and lying divination,” and then they prophesied lies: and their predictions as much contradicted their former scriptures, as they did the prophecies of Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and other later prophets. (Notes, Jer. xxviii. 8, 9. xxix. 8, 9. 15—32.) The Lord therefore declared, that they should not be in the assembly of Israel: either they would become open apostates; or they would be detected and excommunicated, or cut off by death. Their names also would be expunged from the registers of the house of Israel; and their families should either be extinct, or not be able to claim any inheritance among those who returned from captivity; which would be an emblem of their exclusion from heaven, as not having their names written in the book of life. (Marg. Ref. q—s.—Notes, Ezra ii. 61—64. Ps. lxix. 22—28. Is. iv. 3, 4. Rev. xiii. 8—10.) ‘They shall not be members of the church here, nor partake of the communion of saints in heaven.’ The Hebrew word Sod signifies a secret assembly, or privy council, such as are acquainted with the most inward thoughts, and secret intent of a prince: and from thence it is applied to God’s chosen people, those that are acquainted with “the whole counsel of God,” and whom he instructs by the secret directions of his Holy Spirit. Lowth. (Marg.—Notes, Ps. xxv. 14. Jer. xxiii. 8.)

V. 10—16. The peculiar guilt of the false prophets consisted, in seducing the worshippers of God into idolatry and iniquity, and encouraging them to harden themselves in impenitence; by assuring them of peace and prosperity, at the very time when divine judgments were about to be poured out upon them. (Marg. Ref. t, u.—Notes, 17—23, 22. Jer. iv. 10. vi. 13—15. xiv. 13—16. xxiii. 13—17.) In this manner, perhaps some one of them courted the favour of the people; and the rest, finding him caressed and followed, supported his false predictions by their confident assertions and vain reasonings. (Note, 1 Kings xxii. 13, 14.) Thus they acted, as if a man were to build a slight wall (10, marg.) with loose stones, or bricks without cement; and others should labour to give it an appearance of stability, by daubing it over with mortar made of bad materials, and not properly mixed or tempered: and they should then expect that such a wall would protect them, or that a house built of such walls would serve for a secure habitation. (Marg. Ref. x.—Note, 5.)—The people supposed themselves safe from the assaults of the Chaldeans; because they vainly presumed, that, as the people of God, he was engaged by covenant to preserve them; not considering that they had forfeited the blessing by their crimes: and the prophets laboured to varnish over these presumptuous expectations, by a variety of specious pretences. But the Lord by his prophet assured them, that this worthless wall should certainly fall down, notwithstanding all their daubing. A tremendous inundation with very large hailstones would tear away all the untempered mortar, and the stormy wind would rend the wall itself. This storm, arising from his righteous indignation, would level the wall to the ground and destroy its foundations, and consume those who built it, or sheltered themselves under it, in its own destruction. (Marg. Ref. y—c.—Notes, 1 Kings, xx. 29, 30. Is. xxviii. 17—19. Matt. vii. 24—27. Rom. x. 1—4.)—That is, the Lord would send the Chaldeans to besiege and destroy Jerusalem, and desolate Judah; they would come with such force and fury, as the Jews could by no means withstand; and their success would confute the lying predictions of the prophets, and subvert the false hopes of the people. When these events should take place, the false prophets would be reproached, and taunted with their folly and presumption; till the Lord had accomplished his wrath upon them: and then those who trusted them, would be reminded by God and his prophets, that "the wall was no more, neither they that daubed it." (Marg. Ref. d—g.—Notes, xxii. 25—30.)—Ye, O great hailstones, &c. (11) Or rather, "I will send great hailstones; they shall fall; and the storm of a whirlwind shall rend it."

V. 17—23. As the Lord endued some women with the Spirit of prophecy; so there were others who pretended to it from secular motives. (Marg. Ref. l, m.—Neh. vi. 14.)

But the prophet was ordered to set his face against them also, and to charge them with “prophesying out of their “own heart.”—As a token of the peace and security which they promised, they sewed pillows to their own arm-holes, or “elbows,” and to the arm-holes or elbows of those who consulted them; intimating that they might indulge and repose themselves in security, for no enemy would disturb them. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. o.)—The meaning of the kerchiefs, or coverings, which they put “upon “the head of every stature,” (or of persons of every age indiscriminately,) is not so evident. Some think that they were ornaments, with which they decorated those who consulted them, in token of victory and triumph. Others suppose, that this was spoken figuratively, for their hood-winking them, or keeping them in the dark by their de-lusions. But probably it was some superstitious observance, a kind of amulet or charm, which they employed to entice the people into their snares. ‘These... women for lucre ‘would... tell every man his fortune, giving them pillows ‘to lean on, and kerchiefs to cover their head; to the ‘intent they might the more allure them.’ So that they “hunted their souls:” and, as it seems probable, not only promised the nation deliverance from the Chaldeans; but professed to protect by some spell, the lives of those who applied to them; nay, even to save their souls, by some absolution or indulgence which they vended. ‘The easterns ‘had, and still have, frequent amulets and ribbands of ‘charms, which they put principally at their hands and ‘heads. Such charms these female prophets fabricated, ‘and, as appears, attributed to them the power of pre‘serving the life of those who wore them, and of bringing ‘death on their enemies.’ Michaelis. (Note, Matt. xxiii.
5—7.) Thus they entangled the people in their decep-tions, as if they could save the lives and souls of men; without any respect to their conduct and character.—They seem to have been a company of fortune-tellers; who polluted or profaned the name of God, by pretending to sell his gifts at the most contemptible price; and to deal in divination, and such like impositions, as have in every age found eager purchasers. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. p—z.—
Notes, xxii. 25. Prov. xxviii. 21. Mic. iii. 5—7. Acts viii.
18—24.) They likewise attempted to terrify, with denun-ciations of wrath, those pious persons who refused to bribe them; as if life and death, heaven and hell, were at their disposal! By these artifices they worked upon the fears and hopes of those, who attended to their lies. But the Lord declared, that he was “against them,” and all their signs and charms with which they terrified souls, to cause them to fly into their entangling net: and he would certainly tear them from them, expose them to shame, and deliver the people from their influence and power: because their lies counteracted the intention and tendency of his word; by distressing the minds of upright, godly men, or grieving them, while they saw God dishonoured and souls deceived: whereas the whole revealed will of God tended to encourage such persons, and to make them joyful. On the other hand, their divinations tended to harden and embolden wicked men, by encouraging them to expect peace and safety in their evil ways; contrary to the express declarations of God, that “there is no peace for the wicked.”

(Marg. and Marg. Ref. a—c.) He would therefore speedily terminate their delusions, and deliver his people, and so make his power and glory known to all concerned.—
‘To slay and to make alive, signify here to promise men ‘life, or threaten them with death (22): so the prophet ‘saith, he “came to destroy the city,” (xliii. 3:) that is, to ‘pronounce the sentence of destruction upon it.’ Lowth.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16.

Many possess great subtlety and sagacity, who are utterly destitute of true wisdom: and, whilst the world admires their talents, the Lord brands them as “fools.” This is most awfully the case with numbers, who make the sacred ministry a step to worldly consequence and affluence. They profess to speak in the name of God; but have seen nothing of his glory, of the evil of sin, the worth of souls, the glory and preciousness of Christ, the way of salvation, or the beauty of holiness: they follow their own fancies, human traditions, or Satan’s illusions; and then ascribe the whole to the God of truth: they are subtle, rapacious, and insinuating, in winding themselves into favour and preferment, and pursuing “filthy lucre;” but they are sure to do immense mischief in the fold and vineyard of the Lord. (Notes, Is. lvi. 9—12. Rom. xvi. 17—20. Tit. i.
10—13. 1 Pet. v. 1—4. 2 Pet. ii. 1—3. 12—16. Jude 11 —13.) Instead of standing in the gap to turn away his indignation from the people, by their prayers, holy examples, and zealous endeavours to promote true godliness; they widen the breach, by their wicked lives and erroneous doctrines, their soothing and flattering delusions, which cause men to think themselves deserving of eternal life, even when “the wrath of God abideth on them.” Numbers follow the “pernicious ways” of such false teachers, “by reason of whom the way of truth is evil spoken of;”
and many are seduced to expect the accomplishment of their unscriptural assertions. But the Lord is against them.

CHAP. XIV.

The elders, who enquired of God, while their hearts were set on idols, are sharply reprov'd, and warn'd, 1—5. A call to repentance; with threatenings of temporal and spiritual judgments on many, in order to the reformation of Israel, 6—11. No righteousness of a few individuals would avert the judgments of famine, noisome beasts, sword, or pestilence, from a guilty land; much less these four sore judgments from Jerusalem, 12—21. A promise that a remnant should be preserved, for the instruction and comfort of the captives, 22, 23.

and has not sent them: they shall not be "written among the righteous," nor share the heavenly inheritance: "because, even because, they seduce" the professed worshippers of God, and promise men peace and salvation, without conversion, faith, or holiness.—But indeed there are numerous ways, by which one heresiarch "builds up a wall, and others daub it with untemper'd mortar." Some teach men to expect safety from a comparative decency of moral character; some on account of formal or superstitious observances; some because they belong to an orthodox part of the church, and have got general notions of certain important doctrines; some because of their impressions and enthusiastick reveries; and others even by a direct perversion of the gospel, and encouraging men to "sin on that grace may abound." Each of these descriptions can find specious reasonings, or a few detached texts of scripture, plausibly misinterpreted, to countenance their delusions: (Note, 2 Pet. iii. 14—16:) and men of learning and ingenuity frequently employ themselves in daubing these tottering walls "with untemper'd mortar," to prevent their weakness from being discovered. But they are all alike distant from Christ the true Foundation: they build not on him by a penitent "faith, which worketh by love," and produces obedience; (Notes, 1 Cor. iii. 10—15. Gal. v. 1—6:) they either leave out his merits and atonement, or the work of his new-creating Spirit, or the substantial fruits of righteousness; and in different ways endeavour to varnish, paint, and repair the old building, instead of erecting a new one on a new foundation, for "an habitation of God through the Spirit." How fair soever the wall, thus run up and daubed, may appear to the carnal eye, it will seldom stand the storm of temptation or persecution; and it will afford no shelter in the approaching tempest of death and judgment: then the justice and vengeance of God will rend it in pieces, and destroy it to the ground; and "great will be the fall of it," and the ruin of all who have got under it for shelter. (Notes, Is. viii. 16—20.) Nor will any of the human species be so loaded with ignominy, as those who have thus seduced their fellow sinners to trust in a lie, to their utter destruction: it shall then be enquired of them, "Where is your wall? and where is the daubing, wherewith ye daubed it?" while those whom they have deluded will execrate them, more than ever they admired and commended them. Let us therefore beware of those false prophets, (Note, Matt. vii. 13—20,) who indiscriminately speak peace, and encourage people of every sentiment and character to expect salvation; and let us remember, that though Christ preaches peace to those, near or far off, who repent and believe the gospel; yet he assures us, that "he who believeth not, shall be damned;" and "without holiness no man shall see the Lord."

V. 17—23.

What manifold ways has Satan of deceiving souls! yet because men are so much more disposed to believe soothing lies, than humbling and awakening truths; none of his schemes or instruments, from the wretched fortune-teller to the learned heresiarch, are utterly unsuccessful. The various descriptions of deceivers, who revile or despise each other, agree in promising happiness to those whom the word of God condemns; and in discouraging and grieving those whom it comforts. The masses, indulgences, and protections of the church of Rome, and their anathemas and excommunications of those as hereticks, whom they cannot hunt into their net; (Note, Rev. xiii. 13—17:) the pretended candour of numbers to men of almost every opinion, except those who steadily profess an attachment to the doctrines of scripture; and the delusion of such as connect salvation with any kind of faith, and revile those as Pharisees, who judge of the tree by the fruits: all these, and many others, produce the same effects, in grieving and perplexing upright Christians, and in "strengthening the hands of sinners, that they should not return from their wicked ways."—But confident and mercenary impostors are too numerous to be particularly exposed. Some men's boasts and pretensions would almost persuade one, that health, life, and salvation were at their disposal; in order that they might enrich themselves by turning the gift of God into ready money: and the chief difference between modern and ancient pretenders seems to be, that the former expect a more valuable recompence, than "handfuls of barley and pieces of bread:" and the signs or means, which some of them employ, are at least as ridiculous, as those used by these ancient prophetesses; and like them aptly shew, how they dupe and hoodwink their votaries, and "hunt souls into their net." Thus, for a time they may, and sometimes do, entangle even the people of God; but "he will deliver them out of their hands." They pollute the name of God, by using it to sanction their mercenary impositions, and by covering them over with a profession of religion: but he will vindicate his own glory, and make their folly and wickedness evident to all men: and though numbers are deluded and amused to their ruin; yet it will at last appear, that none were thus fatally duped, except such as hated the truth "and had pleasure in unrighteousness." (Note, 2 Thes. ii. 8—12.) It, however, behoves Christians to keep close to the word of God, and in every thing to seek the teaching of the Holy Spirit, and to stand aloof from whatever appears suspicious. We should try every doctrine and pretension by its agreement with the scripture, and its tendency to promote vital godliness: we should reject all, which tends to discourage the humble believer, or to encourage the presumption of wicked men: we should shun all superstitious observances, and vain enquiries into futurity; and so trust the promises of God, as to obey his commandments, committing ourselves and all our concerns to the keeping of his grace and providence.

NOTES.

CHAP. XIV. V. 1—5. It is uncertain, whether these “elders of Israel” were the leading persons among the captives; or, as some conjecture, certain elders from Jerusalem, who had come to Babylon about business, and who took that opportunity of seeing and hearing the prophet. They came, however, and sat before him to hear his word, and to make enquiries concerning the affairs of the nation. (Marg. Ref. a, b.—Notes, xx. 1—3. xxxiii. 30—33. xxxvi. 37.) Probably, they appeared very grave and devout, and gave great attention to his discourse; and perhaps he was ready to shew them respect and favour. But the Lord saw through their disguises, and revealed their true character. Notwithstanding fair appearances, their hearts were set upon the most abominable and filthy idols: they preferred the service of them to the holy worship of God; so that these were “the stumbling blocks,” over which they fell into all kinds of iniquity; and yet instead of casting them behind their backs, they set them up before their faces, determined to cleave to them at all events.—‘They are not only idolaters in their heart; but they have actually set up idols and worshipped them.’ Lowth. (Marg. Ref. c—f.—Note, vii. 16—19, v. 19.) Could it then at all consist with the glory of God to notice, or to give a favourable answer, to the enquiries of such hypocrites? On the contrary, the prophet was instructed plainly to inform them, that the Lord himself had determined to answer all Israelites, without respect of rank or station, who came with idolatrous hearts to enquire of him, “according to the multitudes of their idols;” either denouncing vengeance upon them proportioned to their aggravated crimes, or giving them up to be deluded to their ruin. Thus he would ensnare them in their own counsels, leave them to manifest the concealed wickedness of their hearts, shew all the world their hateful character, and render them contemptible and miserable: seeing they were all totally alienated from him, through an infatuated attachment to idolatry.—‘That I may deal with them according to their deserts, and thereby convince them, that I am a Searcher of hearts, and know the ... secret wickedness of their thoughts.’ Lowth.—‘He shall be led with lies according as he delighted therein.’ (Marg. Ref. g—k.—Notes, 9—11. vii. 25, 26. Jer. xxi. 1, 2. xxxvii. 1—10.)

V. 6—8. The only way to escape the threatened judgments would be, by repenting, and by “turning them selves,” and endeavouring to turn one another, from all their idols and iniquities to the worship and service of God and by turning away their faces with abhorrence from all their abominations, that they might look another way, and act in a contrary manner. Thus, and thus only, could they expect an answer of peace. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. l, n.—Notes, ix. 3, 4. xviii. 30—32.) For every Israelite, nay every proselyte, or stranger dwelling in the land of Israel would be dealt with according to the foregoing rule. In his heart any man separated from the Lord, favoured idolatry, and looked towards that great occasion of iniquity; (Notes, Gen. xix. 16—22, v. 17. 26. Luke xvii. 32 and then, out of curiosity or a desire to serve God and idol also, to save appearances, or to obtain reputation, should consult the prophets; the Lord would answer every such enquirer, not by the mouth of his prophet, but by himself and his own powerful vengeance. (Marg. Ref. n—r.) He would execute such punishment upon him, as should render him an example and proverb to all others; (Marg. Ref. s, t.—Notes, Deut. xxix. 19—25. 1 Kings ix. 7—9 singling him out from his people, among whom he had impiously intruded; and making known his own omniscience and omnipotence by detecting and avenging his crimes. V. 9—11. These enquirers would soon be weary of consulting God's prophets, and be disposed to apply to those of another character; who would be left, like Ahab's prophets, to the illusions of a lying spirit: and thus being deceived themselves, to believe that prosperity would attend the enquirers, they would deceive them also. (*Marg. Ref. y.—Notes, xiii. 7—16. 1 Kings xxii. 19—23. Is. lxiii. 5—19, v. 17. Though not the Author of the deceived prophet's sin, yet his being left to fall into Satan's delusions was the effect of a judicial sentence against him; and thus God used him as the instrument of blinding and hardening hypocrites, to their destruction. And, as the false prophet only sought his own interest or credit in his predictions, and for that sin was given up to "strong delusion to believe a lie;" as those who consulted him, only sought encouragement in idolatry and wickedness; and as the enmity of their hearts against God prepared them to welcome these delusions, which emboldened them to further rebellion: so the Lord would punish them in awful indignation, and cause them to bear the load of their atrocious guilt, which would involve both the deceived prophet, and the hypocritical enquirer, in the same terrible destruction. Yet this severity to individuals would prove mercy to the house of Israel, by warning them against idolatry and iniquity, that they might still continue the people of God. (*Marg. ii.)—It was a singular honour for Daniel, who was not at this time above thirty years of age, to be ranked with these ancient eminent saints of God, who were most honoured by the answers given to their prayers in their own time.—Yet if these three eminent saints, of different ages, had all lived at once, and united in intercession for a land which had filled up its measure of sin, they would not have prevailed. Their righteousness indeed would either have exempted them from temporal calamities, or converted them into blessings: Yet not as the ground of their acceptance; but their righteous conduct would evince them to be justified persons, and partakers of God's grace and favour; and thus ensure his protection and their everlasting salvation, according to the tenour of the new covenant.—The prayers, examples, and pious labours of eminent believers, have often checked the progress of national wickedness, promoted reformation and true religion, and thus conduced to the lengthening of public tranquillity; and there is abundant encouragement during the time of the Lord's patience and mercy, to use means for the conversion of children, relatives, and neighbours: yet when that time expires, and "the days of vengeance" arrive, no intercession can prevail for the impenitent; nor can any righteous man deliver his nearest relations from destruction. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. o—x.—Notes, Jer. xv. 1—4.) But if this were the case with any other nation, the grievous transgressions of which had provoked God to commission either famine, or destructive beasts, or war, or pestilence, to execute his righteous vengeance upon it; if such men, as Noah, Daniel, or Job, could not prevail for the preservation of a single person, even one of his own children; how much more would this be the case with Jerusalem and Judah, whose unprecedented crimes connected with their special religious advantages, had provoked God to commission against them all these four sore judgments at once, to the total desolation of the land! The nation therefore must not hope to escape, because of a very few pious men among them: individuals must not expect safety, because related to pious persons: nor ought Daniel, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, or other prophets, to repine, that the Lord would not preserve Jerusalem for their sakes, or in answer to their prayers. (Marg. Ref. y—a.)—Staff of bread. (13) Marg. Ref. g.—Note, Ps. cv. 16.—Sword, go, &c. (17) Notes, Jer. xlvii. 6, 7.

V. 22, 23. Though the Lord determined to desolate Jerusalem and Judah, and to execute his "four sore judgments" on the inhabitants: yet for his own name's sake, and out of respect to his covenants with Abraham and David, and his promises relative to the Messiah, he would preserve the lives of a remnant of the Jews, who still remained in the land; both sons and daughters, that they might yet increase for the future replenishing of the land. These would be carried captive into Chaldea: and when the few pious Jews, who were there before, should "see" their ways and doings," they would be comforted concerning the evil which the Lord had done to Jerusalem: perceiving that he had good cause for all the severity which he had exercised; and taking encouragement to expect the performance of his promises of a future restoration, and of many blessings to the people. It is not certain whether this consolation and satisfaction would result from noticing the atrocious wickedness of the captives; or from hearing their penitent confessions, and declarations of the crimes, which had filled Jerusalem and Judah. But probably many of them shewed very plainly, by their abandoned conduct, for what crimes God had executed vengeance on the nation; and others, being brought to repentance, made such a report of the abominations which they had witnessed, as silenced all objections, and composed the minds of the pious remnant to cheerful acquiescence, and confidence in the truth and mercy of God. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, vi. 8—10. vii. 16—19, v. 16. xii. 16.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

Very wicked men may assume such specious appearance of piety, as to impose upon the most discerning minister of Christ: for who can know what secret abominations are practised in the lives, or what unmortified lusts abound in the hearts, of some, who behave themselves devoutly under the preaching of God's word, and the administration of his most solemn ordinances? But the Lord sees through every disguise, and will certainly unmask every dissembler (Note, 1 Cor. iv. 3—5:) and as his answers are addressed to men according to their characters; so we should shew as well as we can, to whom the comforts, and to whom the terrors, belong; "dividing the word of truth" according to the character, conduct, and disposition of our hearers; and leaving the Lord, by means of the conscience, to make the application to individuals. (Notes, 2 Cor. i. 1, 2. v. 9—12, vv. 11, 12. 2 Tim. ii. 14—18, v. 15.)—As the wickedness of man springs from a heart estranged from the holy character, law, and service of God, through the idolatrous love of himself, and of the creatures.—No external decency, form, or reformation, can be acceptable to God, so long as any idol possesses the heart, and rivets him in our affections: yet how many sit to hear his word and join in his worship, and at his table, who idolize rich pleasures, honours, and the praise of men! who seek happiness from worldly distinctions, and confide and rejoice in them, rather than in the love and service of God! and how many, who prefer their own wisdom and righteousness to his glorious salvation! Thus, instead of saying, "What have I to do any more with idols?" and casting them away with abhorrence, they resolutely cleave to them; and these prove stumbling blocks, over which the fall into iniquity and misery. By their secret attachment to worldly objects, they are prepared to listen to the tempter, and to commit scandalous crimes; or, loving this present world, they apostatize from God; (Notes, 1 Tim. vi. 6—10, vv. 8—10. 2 Tim. iv. 9—13;) or cares, riches, and sensual lusts render them unfruitful cumberers of the ground, fit for nothing but to be hewn down and cast into the fire: and “should the LORD be enquired of by such men, or give encouragement to them?” Assuredly, he will “answer them according to the multitude of their idols” and iniquities: he “will set his face against them,” and make them examples of his vengeance: whilst their hypocritical worship will only aggravate their guilt and punishment, and they shall know that the heart-searching God cannot be imposed upon like their fellow mortals. Such persons often grow weary of faithful ministers, and want “teachers after their own lusts,” to comfort them in their evil courses; and they find others of like character ready enough to “teach things which they ought not, for filthy lucre’s sake.” Thus evil men and seducers “are multiplied, and grow worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived:” (Notes, 2 Tim. iii. 13. iv. 1—5, vv. 3, 4;) but the Lord over-rules the whole in awful righteousness, to their mutual delusion and aggravated destruction. He sets his face against some of these teachers and professors of the gospel, for a warning to others: his punishments and threatenings have a tendency to alarm the consciences of the unconverted, and to caution his people to go no more astray from him; and they are made useful to upright believers. The door of mercy is still open: sinners are still called on to repent, and turn from all their iniquities: and all are admitted among the Lord’s people, and have him for their God, who seek to be cleansed by “washing in the Fountain, which he hath opened for sin and uncleanness.”

V. 12—23.

God will inflict many sore judgments on individuals and nations who sin against him: a remnant of pious persons may indeed for a time avert or retard national judgments; but they cannot possibly prevail with him to tolerate wickedness, or to save men in their sins; nor could they in their right mind desire it, even in behalf of their own sons and daughters. The Lord will certainly deliver his servants from all evil, and preserve them to his heavenly kingdom; and he will satisfy them as to his dealings with those, for whom they pleaded in vain: but when the day of patience is expired, the same word and oath of God, which ensure the believer’s salvation, are engaged for the condign punishment of the wicked. At present, “the whole creation groaneth” through the sins of men, and the very beasts of the field in various ways share the miseries of mankind. (Note, Rom. viii. 18—23.) But in the future world sinners alone will suffer, and that in proportion to their personal guilt. Then the assembled universe will see, that “the LORD hath not done without cause, all that he hath done against them:” and his servants will be satisfied with his decisions, even against their nearest relatives. For the detection of men’s sins will manifest the justice of God in their punishment; even as the humble confessions of true believers now magnify the precepts and penalty of his holy law, and give all the glory of salvation to his grace.—In a firm belief, that we shall approve all the dispensations of God, towards ourselves and all mankind, when the whole shall be fully made known to us; let us now impose silence upon our rebellious murmurs and objections, the offspring of pride, ignorance, and unbelief; let us discard our useless anxiety about the case of others, assured that “the Judge of all the earth will do right;” and let us compose our minds into patient resignation to his will, which in all things is “holy, just, and good.”

NOTES.

CHAP. XV. V. 1—5. Ezekiel and his companions seem not to have been easily satisfied, about the predicted judgments on Jerusalem and their nation, which they had been used to consider as “holiness to the LORD.” He was therefore graciously pleased to represent to them the propriety of these dispensations, by an apt similitude, which would also counteract the presumptuous hopes of the people. The church and nation of Israel had often been compared to a vine. (Marg. Ref. a.—Notes, Deut. xxxii. 32, 33. Ps. lxxx. 8—16. Is. v. 1—7. Jer. ii. 20, 21.) A vine is peculiarly valuable if fruitful; otherwise it is almost as unsightly and worthless as a bramble: other fruit-trees may be of some use for timber, but the vine is of no value except for its fruit. “What is the wood of the vine more than another tree, or even than a branch of the trees of the forest?” Wood could not be taken from it for any work; not even for a pin or peg to hang a vessel on. (Note, Is. xxii. 20—25, vv. 23—25.) Only some parts of other trees are used for fuel: but “the ends and the middle,” the whole of the vine when cut down, as well as the prunings

6 Therefore thus saith the Lord God; ^f As the vine-tree among the trees of the forest, which I have given to the fire for fuel, so will I give the inhabitants of Jerusalem.

7 And ^g I will set my face against them: ^h they shall go out from one fire, and another fire shall devour them; and ye shall know that I am the LORD, when I set my face against them.

8 And ^k I will make the land desolate, because they have ^{*} committed a trespass, saith the Lord God.

CHAP. XVI

The original state of Jerusalem is shewn under the emblem of an exposed infant, 1—5; whom God is represented, as rescuing, educating, espousing, and of it from year to year, are consigned to the fire, and nobody attempts to reserve any part of it for other uses. And if it is useless, before it be cast into the fire, what can it be good for when almost consumed? (Marg. and Marg. Ref. b—e.—Notes, John xv. 6—8, v. 6.)

V. 6—8. The nation of Israel, of which the inhabitants of Jerusalem were the chief, was, in respect of other nations, as the vine in respect of the trees of the forest. Other nations were renowned for arts and arms, and became eminent and formidable, and the Lord used them in his providence as he saw good: but Israel was his vine, from which he looked for the fruits of spiritual worship and holy obedience. They, however, proved unfruitful, or brought forth poisonous berries like the wild vine. (Marg. Ref. f.—Notes, Is. v. 1—7.) He would therefore at present make no use of them, except as fuel to the fire of his indignation, that his justice might be glorified in their punishment. By the ruin of the ten tribes, and the preceding judgments executed upon Judah, both ends of the vine were already burned, and the Lord did not mean to preserve the middle. He had set his face against Jerusalem and Judah, as an adversary; and the people would be consumed by one calamity after another, till the land should be utterly desolated. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. g—k.—Notes, xvii. 3—10. xx. 45—48. Ps. lxxxvii. P. O.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The condescension of God to the infirmity of his servants, in satisfying them concerning the equity and propriety of his dealings with sinners, is very great.—Men are very prone to value themselves on those distinctions and advantages, which, not being productive of suitable effects on their hearts and lives, render them doubly criminal. Unholy professors of evangelical truth, and hypocritical worshippers of the true God, are, in his judgment, the refuse of the human species; for they dishonour his name more than other sinners do, and will be rendered by him proportionably contemptible. No eminence in other endowments can avail them any thing; for fruitfulness in good works is the proper excellency of a professed Chris-richly providing for, 6—14; but she commits the most abandoned and multiplied adulteries, 15—34: and is threatened with most terrible punishments, 35—43. Her crimes shewn to equal those of her mother, the Hittite, and to exceed those of her sisters, Sodom and Samaria, 44—59. Yet at length she will be received to favour, and be deeply ashamed of her base conduct, 60—63.

AGAIN, the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,

2 Son of man, ^a cause Jerusalem to know her ^b abominations;

3 And say, Thus saith the Lord God unto Jerusalem; ^c Thy ^{*} birth, and thy nativity is of the land of Canaan; thy father was an ^d Amorite, and thy mother an ^e Hittite.

4 And as ^f for thy nativity, in the tian: and indeed, in all other things the church has generally been eclipsed by the people of the world.—When the worshippers of God, therefore, do not glorify him, adorn the gospel, and serve their generation, by their holy lives; they are condemned as refuse wood, as thorns and briers, and prove as dry fuel to the flames: and when the Lord sets his face against them, they will go from one fire to another, till they be consumed. (Notes, Matt. iii. 7—10. Heb. vi. 7, 8.) Let us then beware of an unfruitful profession of the gospel: let us come to Christ and “abide in him,” and seek to have “his words abide in us:” then shall we bring forth much fruit, glorify God, and be approved as true disciples of the Lord Jesus; whilst the unfruitful branches will be broken off, gathered together, and cast into the fire.

NOTES.

CHAP. XVI. V. 2. Ezekiel prophesied in Chaldea; but his predictions chiefly related to the Jews in their own land, and tended to corroborate those of Jeremiah; and Jeremiah, whilst he prophesied at Jerusalem, sent messages to the captives. (Notes, Jer. xxix.) Thus the two prophets assisted each other, by this apparent interference with one another's work.—In the foregoing chapter, the conduct of God towards the Jews had been justified, by shewing that they were an unfruitful vine: yet this was not the worst of them by far; for the horrible crimes committed by them merited the severest punishments. But pride and self-flattery rendered the people blind to all the abomination which filled Jerusalem: these the prophet was to represent to them by a parable, that they might see themselves as in a glass, and discover what manner of persons they were. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xx. 4. Is. lviii. 1, 2.)

V. 3—5. The subsequent allegory, or parable, immediately related to the nation of Israel; but, as that was the visible church of God, and a type of his true people, it has generally been accommodated to the case of individual believers: yet, unless this be done with great caution, very erroneous and injurious conclusions may be deduced from it. For every one must perceive the absurdity of supposing

* Or, when I looked upon thee. day thou wast born, thy navel was not cut, neither wast thou washed in water
 g Lam. ii. 20.  to supple thee; thou wast not salted*
 h Ex. ii. 6. Is. xlix. 15. Lam. ii. 11, 12. 19. iv. 3, 4. 10. at all, nor swaddled at all.

5 None ^b eye pitied thee, to do any of these unto thee, to have compassion upon thee; ⁱ but thou wast cast out in the open field, to the loathing of thy person, in the day that thou wast born.

6 And when I passed by thee, ^k and saw thee [†] polluted in thine own blood, I said unto thee when thou wast in thy blood, ^l Live; yea, I said unto thee when thou wast in thy blood, Live.

that true believers, after conversion, actually run into all the enormous wickedness described in this allegory; so as to exceed in every abomination the worst enemies of religion.—The prophet was commanded to remind Jerusalem of her base and mean original. It is evident, that the beginning relates to the whole nation of Israel; but afterwards a distinction is made between Jerusalem and Samaria.—Jerusalem, though at length “the holy city,” was originally built by the Canaanites; and generally inhabited by the Jebusites, who were descended from Canaan, till David took it. (Notes, Gen. x. 15—19. Judg. i. 21. 2 Sam. v. 6—8.) Yet Jerusalem’s “birth and nativity of the land of Canaan,” refers rather to the inhabitants than to the city itself. Abraham and Sarah, the ancestors of Israel, had originally been idolaters, as the Hittites and Amorites were: (Note, Josh. xxiv. 2 :) and their posterity, when they had expelled these nations, and possessed their land, seemed to be their descendants, as resembling them in character and conduct. (Notes, Matt. iii. 7—10. John viii. 37—40. Rom. iv. 9—17.)—“Thou boastest to be the seed of Abraham, but thou art degenerate, and followest the abominations of the wicked Canaanites, as children do the manners of their fathers.”—The nativity of Israel, as a distinct people, may be dated from the time when the family of Jacob was multiplied into a nation. But, at this period, they were reduced to abject slavery, and cruelly oppressed; they drudged in the brick-kilns, and were covered with the clay; their male children were ordered to be slain or exposed; they were apparently deserted of God, and in general forgetful of him, and polluted with the idolatries, superstitions, and vices of their oppressors. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, xx. 5—9. xxiii. 3. Ex. i. 14—22. v. 12—23. Ps. lxxviii. 13. lxxxix. 6.) Thus the new-born nation, (so to speak,) was like an infant, which was cast out and exposed, according to the barbarous custom of ancient times, and of many heathen nations at this day; which had none to wash, cleanse, and clothe it, or do any thing for it; but was left, as unpitied and loathed, to perish in the day on which it was born.—This was an apt representation of the wretched and perilous condition of Israel in Egypt: and it is also a striking emblem of our original state of sin and misery. (Notes, Eph. ii. 1—3. Tit. iii. 3.)

V. 6—8. Whilst this perishing infant lay defiled and trampled on in its blood, a loathsome as well as a pitiable

7 I have [†] caused thee to multiply as the bud of the field, and thou hast increased and waxen great, and thou art come to [§] excellent ornaments: thy breasts are fashioned, and thine hair is grown, ^m whereas thou wast naked and bare.

8 Now when I passed by thee, and looked upon thee, behold, ⁿ thy time was the time of love; ^o and I spread my skirt over thee, and covered thy nakedness: yea, ^p I swear unto thee, and entered into a covenant with thee, saith the Lord God, and thou becamest mine.

object; the Lord passed by, beheld it with compassion, and said to it, “Live.” (Marg. and Marg. Ref. k, l.—Notes, Ex. ii. 5—9. Luke x. 30—37, vv. 30—34.) This is repeated, the more deeply to fix the reader’s attention to that circumstance. Nothing in the character of Israel deserved his favour or attracted his esteem; but every thing was suited to excite his abhorrence and to merit his indignation: yet from mere compassion and good-will he preserved the nation. (Notes, xx. 5—9. Deut. ix. 4—6. Eph. ii. 4—10. Tit. ii. 4—7.) He spake with power; and by his word he restrained the rage of their Egyptian oppressors, and at length redeemed Israel from bondage. By his blessing they had multiplied exceedingly in Egypt: at length they were brought forth with an out-stretched arm, and formed into a powerful nation, under rulers and princes of their own. The Lord also adorned them with “ornament of ornaments,” (marg.) that is, most abundant ornaments, by giving them his righteous laws and statutes; and setting up his tabernacle, and manifesting his power and presence among them; by the ark of the covenant, the pillar of fire and cloud, the solemnities of mount Sinai, and the miracles which he wrought for them. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. m, n.) Thus the out-cast infant grew up to be a marriageable woman, of comely form and excellently decorated: that is, Israel was prepared to be admitted into covenant with God, and espoused to him to bring up children to him. This he had in view from the first: when he passed by, and saw the perishing out-cast, it was “a time of love;” he intended first to be a Father, and then a Husband unto her: so that “he spread his skirt over her,” (Note, Ruth iii. 9,) and espoused her to himself, covering the shame of her former destitute condition, taking her under his immediate protection, and ennobling her by this high and honourable relation. (Marg. Ref. p.—Notes, xxiii. 4. Cant. iii. 11. Jer. ii. 2, 3. xxxi. 31—34. Hos. i. 2, 3.) This covenant was confirmed with an oath, or engagement to fidelity, and thus Israel became the Lord’s peculiar people. And, as a wife (especially when taken from so destitute a situation, and favoured in so extraordinary a manner,) is bound to the most unreserved fidelity, obedience, love, and regard to her husband; so Israel was bound by every possible obligation to a devoted attachment to God, and an entire dependence on him, as his holy worshippers and obedient servants.

V. 9—14. These verses (continuing the allegory of an out-cast infant, which a traveller sees, and pities, and takes care of,) enumerate the several benefits conferred on Israel, from their low estate in Egypt, to the height of their prosperity and greatness in the days of David and Solomon. The washing with water might refer to the frequent ablutions, and purifications appointed by the ceremonial law; but it included all the methods, which the Lord used to render Israel a holy nation, to purge them from the idolatries and defilements of Egypt, and to prepare them for his spiritual worship and service. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. q.) The anointing with oil, though employed on festive occasions, or preparing women for their nuptials on some occasions, (Ruth iii. 3. Esth. ii. 12. Is. lvii. 9,) may yet refer to the holy oil used in the consecration of the priests and the vessels of the sanctuary; and it signified the gifts and graces bestowed on numbers, for the edification and benefit of the nation, in order to their consecration to the Lord. (Marg. Ref. r.) The various ornaments afterwards mentioned, which doubtless accorded to the attire of females of the highest rank in those times, represented Israel's settlement and prosperity in Canaan; the wealth, power, and honour to which they were advanced, especially under David and Solomon; the building and enriching of the temple; and all the temporal and spiritual benefits, by which the Lord distinguished them as a people dear unto him. So that the exposed infant, being rescued and educated, and espoused to the Lord, was advanced to be a princess, whose ornaments, raiment, and provisions were suited to her high and distinguished rank. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. s—f.—Gen. xxiv. 22. 53.—Notes, Deut. xxxii. 13, 14. Prov. i. 9. Is. iii. 18—26, vv. 18—23. lxi. 10, 11. Eph. v. 22—27.)—Israel from the most abject state became a powerful kingdom, renowned among the nations, for the wise and equitable administration of their princes, the excellence of their laws, and the prosperity and happiness of the people: this was wholly owing to “the comeliness” or honour which the Lord had “put upon them;” and it rendered them a complete pattern for other nations to copy after. (Marg. Ref. g, h.—Notes, Deut. iv. 6—8. 1 Kings iv. 29—34. x. 1—9. 24—27. 2 Chr. ii. 11, 12. Ps. xlviii. 1—3.) In this, the case differs from the espousals of the meanest woman to the mightiest monarch: she may owe all her rank and ornaments to him; but her beauty must be the gift of the Creator.—No doubt this is emblematical of a sinner's conversion, and of the believer's privileges; but the external means, or the signs, of spiritual blessings, rather than the blessings themselves, must be intended, as it is spoken of Israel as a nation.—‘As the child is always washed with water as soon as born, (4. 9,) is not this referred to by the use of water in Christian baptism, as the emblem of regeneration?’ Mede.

V. 15—22. Adultery in all cases has always, in every country, been deemed a very heinous offence, and it was by the law of God a capital crime: but it would be peculiarly aggravated in a woman, who had been favoured and advanced in the manner above described. Thus, idolatry in others might be deemed spiritual fornication: but in 22 And in all thine abominations and thy whoredoms, ^{*} thou hast not remembered the days of thy youth, when thou wast naked and bare, and wast polluted in thy blood.

23 And it came to pass after all thy wickedness, (^y woe, woe unto thee! saith the Lord God;)

24 That ^z thou hast also built unto thee an ^{*} eminent place, ^a and hast made thee an high place in every street.

25 Thou hast built thy high place at every head of the way, ^c and hast made thy beauty to be abhorred, and hast opened thy feet to every one that passed by, and multiplied thy whoredoms.

26 Thou hast also committed fornication ^d with the Egyptians thy neighbours, great of flesh; and hast increased thy whoredoms, to provoke me to anger.

27 Behold, therefore ^e I have stretched out my hand over thee, ^f and have diminished thine ordinary food, ^g and delivered thee unto the will of them that hate thee, ^h the [†] daughters of the Philistines, ⁱ which are ashamed of thy lewd way.

28 Thou ^k hast played the whore also with the Assyrians, because thou wast unsatiable; yea, thou hast played the harlot with them, and yet couldest not be satisfied.

29 Thou hast moreover multiplied

Israel it was adultery; a violation of the marriage-covenant, accompanied with the basest ingratitude, and evidencing a most depraved state of the heart; inexpressibly dishonourable to God, when the basest idols were deliberately preferred before him; a provocation of his jealousy; a forfeiture of all the privileges of the nation, and an introduction to every other kind of wickedness. (Marg. Ref. i, k.—Note, Ex. xxxiv. 11—17, v. 14.)—The sacred writers in general use this allusion, because of the similarity of principles, from which idolatry and adultery originate; because both of them are extremely infamous and hateful; and, perhaps, because idolatry and lewdness commonly went together. But this prophet spake of it in an indignant manner peculiar to himself; and he exposed Israel's infamy, in language taken from the conduct of the most shameless prostitutes, and suited to mark their crimes as most loathsome and detestable. (Notes, xxiii. 5—21. Is. lvii. 3—10. Jer. ii. 20—30. iii. 1—3. 6—11. Hos. i. 2, 3.)—The wretched outcast having been advanced, enriched, adorned, and prospered by her espousals to God; instead of making a suitable return for these distinguishing, gratuitous, and invaluable favours, grew proud of her beauty; and confiding in her attractions, courted the admiration of other lovers, committed adultery with them, and soon became an infamous prostitute. That is, Israel became proud of their numbers, strength, riches, reputation, and privileges; and thus departed from God, made alliances with the heathen nations, and worshipped their idols. This was in some measure the case, from the time of the golden calf in the wilderness, through their successive generations: but it became more so in the latter years of Solomon, and afterwards when Jeroboam established idolatry in the kingdom of the ten tribes, and under the idolatrous kings of Judah till the captivity. (Notes, xx. 11—29. 1 Kings xi. 1—8. xii. 26—33.) The adulteress also took the garments which her husband had provided for her, and with them formed and adorned splendid tents, in which to meet her paramours: that is, Israel spent their wealth and abundance in building and decorating idol-temples, and maintaining the idolatrous worship at them. (Marg. Ref. l, m.—Notes, Hos. ii. 1—13. viii. 9, 10.) This the Lord abhorred as base beyond example, and he determined to put an end to it: as the jealous husband refuses to support the extravagance of his wife, who spends his substance in entertaining her lovers—They had also formed their gold and silver into graven images: and though these were of various forms, both male and female; yet they are here represented as images of men, with whom the adulteress committed lewdness: and she even preferred these lifeless images to the company of her husband; that is, Israel preferred the worship of dead idols to that of the living God. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. n—q.) Not only did they lavish all the productions of Canaan in the service of idols: but they burned their children in the fire to Molech, who were also the children of the covenant, and devoted to the Lord in circumcision: as if a woman should not only waste her husband's wealth on her lovers, but should murder the children which she had born to him, in order to gratify them! (Marg. and Marg. Ref. r—u.—Note, xxiii. 4.) And could such conduct be deemed a small matter, an excusable misdemeanor? In all these abominable idolatries, they had not remembered the low and defiled condition, from which God had delivered them, nor any of the favours which he had bestowed on them. (Notes, 3—5. 60—63, v. 63. Is. li. 1—3. Eph. ii. 14—13.)

Pass through. (21) 'The verb Henebir, translated "to cause them to pass through the fire," signifies also to dedicate. ... (Ex. xiii. 12.) So the words imply, that the Jews, instead of dedicating their first-born to God, as the law required, offered them up a sacrifice to the devil that was worshipped in their idols.' Lowth. (Notes, xx. 25, 26. 30—32. xxiii. 39.)—Polluted, &c. (22) "Wallowing." "Kicking thyself." Bp. Newcombe. (6, marg.)

ness. After all her former adulteries, for which a dreadful woe is pronounced on her, she builded for herself an eminent place, or a brothel, as well as made high places in every street of Jerusalem. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. z—c.) This may refer to the conduct of Manasseh and other kings of Judah, who made the temple itself the scene of their open and abominable idolatries, in addition to all their other idol-temples! So that at length their relation to God, and the temple itself, tended to render them more odious and despicable: as even libertines despise women who are shameless in their conduct. Allured by the prosperity of the Egyptians, they connected themselves with them, and joined in their multiplied and abominable idolatries, for which they were noted above other nations. (Marg. Ref. d.—Notes, xxiii. 5—21.) And when the Lord frequently corrected Israel for their crimes, by wars, famines, and other judgments, and by delivering them into the hands of their enemies; when he especially punished them by the Philistines, the daughters of whom are represented as ashamed of the enormous idolatry of the Jews, though idolaters themselves; instead of being amended by it, they formed alliances with the Assyrians and worshipped their gods; yea, they followed every idol, which was worshipped by the several nations between Canaan and Chaldea; and still they were not satisfied, but sought out new objects of their abominable idolatry. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. e—1.—Notes, 2 Kings xxi. 1—8. 2 Chr. xxv. 14—16, v. 14. xxviii. 22, 23.)—‘Thou hast defiled thyself with all the idolatries of the heathen, beginning with those which were practised by the former inhabitants of Canaan, and by degrees learning new species of idolatry derived from distant countries, such as Chaldea.’ Lowth.

V. 30—34. The powers of the soul should restrain and govern all the inferior inclinations: so that strong and ungovernable lusts prove a weak and inactive mind. (Note, Matt. xxvi. 40, 41.) How weak then must be the heart of this adulteress, who was enslaved to her lusts, and copied the most abandoned prostitutes; and yet acted with imperiousness, disdaining authority or controul, and was under the power of pride and arrogance, as well as of sensuality!—How senseless and irresolute must Israel be, who preferred a rabble of dunghill deities to the living God! who scorned his merciful authority, and yet were proud of their abused privileges!—In one respect this harlot differed from all others: she did not commit wickedness for hire; which, though a base motive, might imply some palliation of guilt, especially when sharp necessity urged: but she was a wife, who abounded in all things; and yet, from mere licentiousness, and aversion to her husband, she prostituted herself to the basest strangers, and lavished his wealth in hiring them to come to her: that is, Israel always prospered when they adhered to the worship of the Lord; but were always impoverished and enslaved when they forsook God and ran into idolatry: and the alliances they formed with the neighbouring nations, (which made way for worshipping their idols,) were very expensive at the time, and ruinous in the event. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, 2 Kings xv. 19, 20. xvi. 7—9. Is. xxx. 6, 7. lvii. 9, 10.)

V. 35—43. The adulteress having been arraigned, and her guilt undeniably proved, the Judge proceeded to pronounce sentence. For the enormous idolatries, cruelty, and persecution of Jerusalem and Judah, the Lord had determined to gather the surrounding nations, both those with whom they had formed alliances, as the Egyptians and Assyrians; and such as had always been inimical to them, as Edom, Ammon, Moab, and Philistia; to inflict, their hand, and ^d they shall throw down thine eminent place, and shall break down thy high places: they ^e shall strip thee also of thy clothes, and shall take ^f thy fair jewels, and leave thee naked and bare.

40 They ^f shall also bring up a company against thee, and they shall stone thee with stones, ^g and thrust thee through with their swords.

41 And they shall ^h burn thine houses with fire, ⁱ and execute judgments upon thee in the sight of many women: ^k and I will cause thee to cease from playing the harlot, and thou also shalt give no hire any more.

42 So ^l will I make my fury toward thee to rest, and my jealousy shall depart from thee, and I will be quiet,
^m and will be no more angry.

43 Because ⁿ thou hast not remembered the days of thy youth, ^o but hast fretted me in all these things; behold, therefore, ^p I also will recompense thy or to witness, his judgments upon them. (Marg. Ref. z

—b.—Notes, xxiii. 5—10. xxv. Jer. iv. 30, 31. Hos. ii. 10 —13.) Before these nations he resolved to expose the enormous crimes of the Jews, to deprive them of all their privileges, and to put them to shame and contempt: as if a woman should be stripped naked, and publicly exposed; a punishment in some places inflicted on profligate women. Thus he would condemn them for their abominable idolatries, and for burning their children in the fire, according to the judgment on adulteresses and murderers:
and he would execute the sentence with jealous indignation.
(Marg. and Marg. Ref. c.—Notes, Rev. xvii. 1—6.) He would give Jerusalem into the hand of the Chaldeans, who would throw down the city and temple, which the Jews had polluted by idolatry; level their cities and high places with the ground; slay, plunder, and enslave the people; and drive the remnant of them as naked captives before them. (Notes, Is. xx. 2—4. xlvii. 1—3.) Thus they would serve Jerusalem, as men used to deal with adulterous women, whom they stoned, slew with the sword, or otherwise put to death: (Marg. and Marg. Ref. d—g.—Notes, John viii. 3—11, v. 5 :) they would burn all her palaces and edifices with fire, and make her an example to other cities and nations; as the death of an adulteress warned other women not to copy her crimes. Then would the cry of the Lord rest on Jerusalem: in this manner he would terminate her idolatries, and disable the Jews from building or endowing any more idol-temples: thus his justice being satisfied, his jealousy would subside; and, having executed his purposes of vengeance, he would be quiet, and cease from his indignation. (Marg. Ref. h—p.

timates that, after the destruction of Jerusalem, the Lord would yet have mercy on the remnant of the nation.—He would, however, certainly execute this vengeance upon them for their ingratitude, because they had grieved and provoked their Benefactor by their crimes, and in order to destroy idolatry from among them.—The punishment of the adulteress by stoning her, and thrusting her through with a sword, as compared with the subsequent intimations of mercy in reserve for her, keeps continually before the mind the intent and purport of the allegory, as relating to a collective body through succeeding generations; at some times exposed to divine judgments sweeping away very great numbers, and at other times the residue brought to repentance, and visited in mercy. So that, in expounding the chapter, it is very difficult to keep the allegory, and the thing signified by it, so fully distinct as it might be desired.

I also will recompense, &c. (43) "I also have brought "thy way upon thy head...yet hast not thou had consi"deration of all thine abominations." Old Version. "I "have punished thy faults; but thou wouldest not repent."

V. 44—47. Those who framed or used sententious sayings, would form a proverb concerning Jerusalem, or apply an old proverb to her, and would say, "As is the mother,
"so is her daughter;" intimating that the nation of Israel was just such a people, as the Hittites and Amorites whom they had supplanted had been. (Marg. Ref. q, r.—Notes, 3—5. Lev. xviii. 24—30.) The Canaanites had early apostatized from the God of their fathers, and were among the first idolaters after the deluge: they had loathed and abhorred the worship of the Lord, and had burned their children in the fire to their idols. Though they had not been solemnly espoused to the Lord, as Israel was; yet he 48 As I live, saith the Lord God, ^a Sodom thy sister hath not done, she nor her daughters, as thou hast done, thou and thy daughters.

49 Behold, this was the iniquity of thy sister Sodom, ^b pride, ^c fulness of bread, and abundance of idleness was in her and in her daughters, ^d neither did she strengthen the hand of the poor and needy.

50 And they were haughty, ^e and committed abomination before me: ^f therefore I took them away as I saw good.

51 Neither hath ^g Samaria committed half of thy sins; but thou hast multiplied thine abominations more than they, and hast ^h justified thy sisters in all thine abominations which thou hast done.

52 Thou also, ⁱ which hast judged thy sisters, ^k bear thine own shame, for thy sins that thou hast committed more abominable than they: ^l they are more righteous than thou: yea, be thou confounded also, and bear thy shame, in that thou hast justified thy sisters.

53 When I shall ^m bring again their captivity, the captivity of Sodom and her daughters, and the captivity of Samaria and her daughters, then will I bring again the captivity of thy captives ⁿ in the midst of them:

54 That ^o thou mayest bear thine own shame, and mayest be confounded in all that thou hast done, ^p in that thou art a comfort unto them.

might, in some sense, be called their husband, especially when they first renounced his worship to follow after idols: and Israel had copied exactly their conduct, in apostasy from God, idolatry, and cruelty to their children. (Marg. Ref. s, t.—Deut. xii. 31. Notes, 6—22. Ps. cvi. 35—38.) Jerusalem had also copied the example of Samaria, called here her elder sister; because the kingdom of Israel was larger than that of Judah, and because Israel had led the way in open apostasy and idolatry, which Judah had followed. Nay, Jerusalem proved her relation to Sodom itself, which had been an inferior city and state, to the east of Jerusalem; for the Jews had copied the abominations of Sodom and of the other cities which had been destroyed with her. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. u—y.) Nor must Jerusalem take umbrage at being considered as of the same family with Samaria and Sodom: seeing she thought it a small matter to imitate their crimes; but had improved upon them and exceeded them, as if ambitious of pre-eminence and distinction in wickedness. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. z.—Notes, 48—51. v. 5—10. Jer. ii. 33—37.)—As if that, &c. (47) “That was loathed as a “small thing.” Marg. (Note, viii. 17.) The daughters of Samaria and Sodom, signify the cities and towns dependent on them.—“Samaria lay northward of Jerusalem, and Sodom southward, which two quarters of the world are expressed by the right and left, ... being placed in such a position to those that set their faces eastward. ... Gen. xiii. 9.” Lowth.

V. 48—51. The Lord here confirmed it with a solemn oath, for fuller assurance, that the sins of Sodom were not equal to those of Jerusalem. Being situated in a very fruitful country, the inhabitants of Sodom and the adjacent cities grew proud of their wealth and prosperity, indulged in luxury and sensuality, and attended to nothing but present gratification; for which they had abundant leisure, not being constrained to much labour in so productive a region: and in general they lived in peace and presumptuous security. At the same time, they neglected to protect and uphold the poor and needy, and probably their rulers oppressed and enslaved them. In short they were proud, and despised warnings or reproofs, when given up to unnatural lusts; and the Lord took them away by a tremendous judgment as he saw good. (Notes, Gen. xiii. 13. xviii. 20—32. xix. 1—29.) Yet they had not sinned against so clear a light and such abundant advantages, or with so many aggravations, as Jerusalem had done. (Marg. Ref. a—f.—Notes, Lam. iv. 6. Matt. xi. 20—24.)—Nor yet had Samaria stood it out against so many warnings and mercies, or multiplied idols, or persisted in idolatry in opposition to the efforts of several pious reforming kings, and such a long continued succession of eminent prophets, as Jerusalem had done. (Note, Jer. iii. 6—11.) So that the conduct of the Jews tended to justify, or by comparison extenuate, the guilt of both Sodom and Samaria. (Notes, Gen. xxxviii. 26. Matt. xii. 41, 42. Heb. xi. 7.)—“Pride and luxury make men expensive in their own way of living, and regardless of the wants and miseries of others. (Luke xvi. 20, 21.)—The ingratitude of Jerusalem was greater than that of Samaria; because God had placed his name there: whose worship she forsook, and profaned the temple, by placing idols in it; which was a degree of idolatry beyond any thing the ten tribes had been guilty of. (v. 11. vii. 20. viii. 6. 16. xxiii. 38, 39. xliii. 8. 2 Kings xvi. 14. xxi. 7. 9.)” Lowth.—It is highly worthy of notice, that want of charity to the poor and needy should be mentioned among the crimes, which brought tremendous judgments on abandoned Sodom: yet the poor also were profligate, and involved in the same destruction.

V. 52—55. The Jews had perhaps proudly judged and condemned the Samaritans and Sodomites, as justly punished: and yet their own conduct tended to justify them; for they had followed and far exceeded their abominations

(Marg. Ref. i, k.—Notes, 48—51, v. 51. Matt. vii. 1—5. Rom. ii. 1—3.) As these two ruined cities had been more righteous than Jerusalem, could that city expect to escape the punishment due to her enormous crimes? Multitudes of the Jews would therefore be as dreadfully destroyed as the Sodomites had been; others would be dispersed and lost among the Gentiles, as the Israelites were. Many of the Israelites would return with the Jews after the captivity; and many of the Jews would bear their shame by continuing in their dispersions. As they had kept the inhabitants of Sodom and Samaria in countenance by their crimes, and thus been a comfort to them; so Jerusalem should never be reinstated in her former glory, nor the Jews be wholly restored from their captivity, until Sodom and Samaria were restored likewise. This may mean, that they never would be thus restored: but it rather relates to the conversion of the Gentiles, who are frequently spoken of by the name of some nation, which was most given up to idolatry and iniquity. (Marg. Ref. l—q.—Notes, Is. xxxiv. lxiii. 1—6. Jer. xlviii. 47. xlix. 6. Rev. xi. 7—12, v. 8.) Then, and not before, should the captivity of Judah be fully restored.—This took place in part in the apostolical age, but its most signal accomplishment is doubtless yet future. (Notes, Rom. xi. 11—15. 25—32.)

V. 56—59. Either the Jews entirely overlooked the example, set before them in the desolations of Sodom; or, being proud of their privileges and prosperity, they would have disdained to mention so infamous a place, especially as standing in any near relation to them. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. r, s.—Notes, Is. i. 7—9, v. 9. 10—15, v. 10.) This was peculiarly the case, before the iniquity of the Jews was discovered, by the punishments inflicted on them, during the invasions of the land by the Syrians and Philistines, in the reign of Ahaz: (Marg. and Marg. Ref. t, u.—Notes, 1 Kings xvi. 5—16. 2 Chr. xxviii. 5. 16—23:) but on the contrary, at the time when Ezekiel wrote, the Gentiles reproached and despised the Jews, as a most abominable people. (27. Note, Lam. iv. 13—16.) These and other judgments had come upon them for their idolatries, of which they had openly borne the shame: but the Lord meant further to deal with them after their deserts; especially in violating their covenant-engagements, which they had so solemnly ratified, but now despised as of no value or obligation. (Marg. Ref. y, z.)

V. 60—63. The Lord did not, however, intend finally to cast off the whole people of Israel. Of his mere mercy and abundant grace, he would remember his covenant with Abraham and Israel; and even that made with the nation at mount Sinai: and he would establish with them a better and more enduring covenant. If this at all refer to the return of the Jews from Babylon; no doubt it more directly predicts the conversion of Jews and Gentiles to Christ, and their future restoration to the church and their own land, when “the fulness of the Gentiles also shall come in.” At these periods, the Jews would remember, and be ashamed of their former evil ways; and willingly receive into communion with them the worst of the heathen, when converted to Christ; the Lord will then give unto Jerusalem “for daughters,” those very persons whom she had disdained to acknowledge as sisters; that is, the gentile converts would be brought into God’s family, as the children of his ancient church. (Marg. Ref. d, e.) This would be effected, not by the national covenant made with Israel; but by the new covenant of grace in the hands of Christ our Mediator; a covenant established upon better promises, and they would then indeed know the Lord. (Marg. Ref. a, b. g.—Notes, xxxvi. 25—27. Gen. xvii. 7, 8. Ex. xix. 5. xxiv. 3—20, Lev. xxvi. 41, 42, v. 42. 2 Sam. xxiii. 5. Is. lv. 1—3, v. 3. Jer. xxxi. 31—34. xxxii. 39—41. Heb. viii. 7—13. xiii. 11. 21.) All these events would concur in humbling them for their sins; and they would then remember all their shameful behaviour to their merciful God; which would cover them with confusion, and silence their boasts of being the peculiar and exclusive favourites of heaven, their complaints of the Lord’s dealings with them, their self-justification, and their revilings and contemptuous abuse of the poor Gentiles. When the Lord had shewn himself reconciled to them, they would scarcely be able to forgive themselves, and would only have their mouths open before him in humble confessions and fervent prayers, praises, and

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

N. B. The peculiar arrangement of these Practical Observations renders it impossible to divide them according to the verses of the chapter; the distinct subjects therefore are only separated by a break.

As men are with great difficulty made sensible of the heinous guilt of their conduct towards God, and as this conviction is absolutely necessary to repentance and faith in Christ; so it is the duty of ministers frequently to set before them their sins, with all the aggravations of them, as the appointed means of this humiliation.—None are with more difficulty convinced of their abominations than hypocrites: nor should any be reproved and exposed, with so great severity and abhorrence.—Human depravity is most evident in the wickedness of those, who have been most favoured with the means of becoming holy, and in the similarity, hitherto lamentably observable, between the visible church and the rest of the world; except as the former has produced the most monstrous abominations. Jerusalem has too generally appeared to be the daughter of the Amorite and the Hittite, and the sister of Samaria and Sodom. If we could survey the Christian church, in all the various forms and places in which it has been established in different ages; we should have a picture before us, not much, if at all more attractive than this of the nation of Israel: though there has always been, in both of them, “a remnant according to the election of grace,” whose pious and quiet lives have been little noticed in history. Otherwise, the annals of the church would be the most melancholy subject that could be contemplated.—Let us turn our thoughts to the first establishment of Christianity in the Gentile world, and especially in the Roman empire. The state of the Gentiles was indeed such, as rendered them a loathsome object in the eyes of a holy God: yet, in a time of pity and love he passed by, and said to them, as they lay perishing in sin and pollution, “Live, yea, he said unto them, Live.” He planted his gospel among them, and caused Christians to multiply exceedingly. At length, the Roman Emperors professing themselves Christians, the church grew great and honourable; Christianity became the established religion; abundance of plained of the captivity of Jeconiah; and of Zedekiah, who had broken his covenant confirmed by an oath, with the king of Babylon, and made an alliance with liberty and encouragement was given to its preachers and professors; the places for publick worship were multiplied, decorated, and enriched by ample donations and endowments, and the church prospered into a kingdom. But what were the consequences? The pride, ambition, rapacity, and licentiousness, the furious contests and cruel persecutions, the superstitions, blasphemies, impostures, and idolatries, which came in, and continued to increase for ages, at length rendered the Christian Roman empire a genuine daughter of the Pagan Roman empire; and all that used poverbs might well say, “As was the mother, so is the daughter.” Nor was there ever a heathen city, or kingdom, on the face of the earth, of which the iniquities, cruelties, and unnatural lusts, the whoredom and adultery, corporal and spiritual, have not been justified, and far exceeded, by the church of Rome and her dependences; which long formed so large a part of Christendom, as to give occasion to her assuming the arrogant title of the Holy Catholick Church!

If we turn our attention to the reformed and protestant churches, which were brought forth out of this antichristian community, in a low, feeble, and despised condition, (as Israel was out of Egypt,) we shall again find cause of lamentation and shame. When they were ready to be overwhelmed in infancy, by the merciless power of their enemies, and seemed to have no helper; when they were still polluted with many of the errors and superstitions of that church from which they had separated, as well as with other corruptions; the Lord in a time of love looked upon them, and said to them, “Live:” he rescued them from their oppressors, increased them abundantly, reduced them to regular order, afforded them abundant means of grace, took them under his protection, espoused them to himself, and they became his. And he continued to purify, instruct, prosper, and adorn them, with eminent and excellent ministers and writers; until they became very “renowned among the nations, through the comeliness which the LORD had put upon them.” But, though they have not run into the gross outward idolatries and enormities of the church of Rome; yet they have become proud of their beauty and “played the harlot.” In many places forms, creeds, and establishments are nearly the whole of what is left of their former excellency; and this dead carcass they idolize: in others, infidelity and scepticism have discarded even the forms of truth and godliness. In covetousness, pride, luxury, and every worldly lust, they have been grievously guilty of idolatry: in impiety, perfidy, perjury, and licentiousness, many of them have vied with Rome herself: and, though more free from the blood of persecution; yet the blood shed by unjust wars and cruel oppressions in different parts of the globe, from a sordid love of gain, renders the daughter too much like her base and abominable mother. It is not necessary to expatiate further on the painful topick; the inference is obvious and unavoidable: no outward forms can change the propensity of man’s heart to depart from God, and rebel against him; but they often give it occasion to rage more vehemently. Whatever nation professing Christianity, whatever sect of Christians, we accurately survey; we shall soon perceive

traces of the same spirit, which led Israel into all their abominations.

Again, if we consider the subject with reference to ourselves, we shall here too find it applicable. When we recollect the mercies of God our Creator in giving us our being and rational powers; in protecting us in helpless infancy and bringing us to maturity; in supplying all our wants, and vouchsafing us innumerable benefits; we cannot but remember at the same time, that we have been forgetful of him, and ungrateful and rebellious in numberless instances. How have we abused his bounty, in making provision for our pride and lusts! How have many of us proceeded from one iniquity to another, as we had time and opportunity! How have we stood it out against warnings, corrections, and convictions; and gone on in sin, though evidently exposed by it to manifold losses, troubles, and sorrows! And should we not have still continued in the same course, through our idolatrous attachment to worldly objects, and our aversion to the spiritual service of God, if we had been left to ourselves? Should we not indeed have done still worse, if our restraints had been removed, and we could have gratified our inclinations without fear or shame? Many have been educated amidst good instructions and edifying examples, and for a time made some profession of religion: yet the lusts of their hearts have broken through all these obstacles, and hurried them away into apostasy, infidelity, and open wickedness. In various ways, the same cause produces similar effects, and it is evinced, that we are all conceived and born in sin, carnally minded, and enmity against God.

If we take a view even of true believers, we shall not fail to discover abundant evidence of the same mortifying truth. They know, that they were “by nature children of wrath, even as others:” they were depraved and polluted, and of the same original propensities as Amorites and Hittites. As they grew up, their innate depravity brought forth its fruit in their words and actions, and proved them to be deserving of God’s wrath and indignation, and meet objects of his loathing and abhorrence. Unless he had saved them, they must have perished, without help or pity; and they had no claim on him: so that they were “cast out to the loathing of their persons, from the day that they were born.” But, in a time of love and mercy, the Lord passed by them, when they lay in this polluted and perishing condition: “of his great love, wherewith he loved them, even when they were dead in sin,” he said unto them, “Live,” and saved them by his grace: he rescued them from the power of Satan, brought them to repentance and faith in Christ, forgave their sins, and took them into covenant with himself, and they became his people. Thus were they “washed, and sanctified, and justified, in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God;” they were consecrated to him by this sacred unction; they were clothed with the robes of righteousness and salvation, enriched with “the unsearchable riches of Christ,” adorned with heavenly graces and privileges; and the God of Heaven became unto them both a Father and a Husband: it is his “good pleasure to give them the kingdom;” and they are made the excellent of the earth, “through the comeliness which he puts upon them.” Far be it from us to suppose, that many of those, who have been thus favoured and blessed, return to the habitual practice of any gross wickedness: but alas! too often even in them, pride and the carnal mind recover much force; they backslide from God, and pursue worthless vanities and idols. Some few have been left to fall from one evil to another, in a most awful manner; to shew whither the bent of their hearts would carry them, if left to themselves, and if they should cease to watch and pray. Others have, in an unguarded hour, given such cause to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme, as has embittered all their future days. And even they, who walk most uniformly in the Lord’s ways, are conscious of so many and strong inward workings of pride and ambition; of such powerful propensities to worldly objects; of such forgetfulness of God and ingratitude to him, and rebellion against his appointments; of such unfaithfulness, unprofitableness, and want of love and zeal; of such weakness of heart and strength of passions, as render them daily more and more sensible, that they equally need, and are equally unworthy of the Lord’s mercy, with the most profligate of their neighbours. They have “the witness in themselves” continually, that they are naturally no better than others, and that all the difference in their state, character, hopes, and prospects, arises from the unmerited mercy and grace of God. They look upon those who are living without God in the world, in pride, idleness, luxury, licentiousness, and cruel oppression of the poor and needy; and are humbly sensible, that it has been the Lord’s doing, that they were not left to live, die, and perish in the same manner. They look at apostates and hypocrites, at proud Pharisees and prouder infidels; and in condemning them, they condemn themselves: for such they have been, or were disposed to be. And though, through grace, they now are not such; yet they so often sin against light and love, that their conduct seems to themselves equally aggravated, even when no eye, but that of God and their enlightened consciences, can see any thing culpable. This disposes them to justify God in all his corrections, which they find to be indispensably necessary for them, and to thank him for them: and whilst they adore his justice in the final destruction of impenitent sinners, they have nothing to say in their own behalf, but feel, that though more favoured, they are no more deserving. Thus the new convert remembers, and is confounded, whilst he reviews the iniquities of his past life, and discovers the enmity of his heart against God and his word. The experienced believer is “ashamed and confounded,” whilst he reviews the evils of his heart and life, even since he was brought acquainted with the Gospel; and his mouth is stopped from impatient murmurs, proud boasting, severe censures, and self-justification: and the fuller his assurance is that the Lord is “pacified to him for all that he hath done,” the more is he ashamed of his ingratitude and rebellion against so merciful a God and Saviour. This temper of mind distinguishes the true Christian from all other men: the Lord will bring all those to it, with whom he “establishes his everlasting covenant;”

and will render them willing to be saved in the same way with the grossest outward offenders, and to receive them, when penitent, as their brethren in Christ Jesus. All others will have their mouths stopped in the day of judgment; and God will glorify himself, and satisfy his justice in their punishment.

But let us rejoice, that, as the Lord would not break his covenant with his ancient servants, because of all the abominations of their descendants; so, he will never forsake his church, with whom he has made “a new covenant, established upon better promises;” nor will he ever leave the sinner to perish, who is humbled for his sins, and comes to trust in his mercy and grace through Jesus Christ; but will “keep him by his power through faith unto salvation.”

NOTES.

CHAP. XVII. V. 2. A riddle.] That is, an emblematic representation, which requires attention and ingenuity to unravel it, but which aptly and elegantly depicts the transactions intended by it. This riddle seems to have been put forth about the time, when Zedekiah was devising to revolt from the king of Babylon, and to form an alliance with the king of Egypt. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xx. 49. Judg. ix. 8—15. xiv. 10—14. Ps. xlix. 1—4, v. 4. Prov. i. 6.)

V. 3, 4. (11, 12.) Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, was described under the emblem of “a great eagle,” because of his towering ambition, and his preying on all his neighbours. The great and long wings of this eagle denoted the extent of his dominions, both in length and breadth: the feathers of divers colours, might signify that he ruled over many countries abounding in people and riches, and of different languages and manners. This eagle came to Lebanon, and cropped off the highest branch of a cedar: that is, Nebuchadnezzar came to Jerusalem, and seized on Jeconiah, of the ancient and honourable family of David. And though he was the highest branch of the cedar, the heir of David’s crown; yet being very young, and newly raised to the throne, in a very enfeebled state of the kingdom, he was no more able to resist the victor, than the tender twig would be to resist the eagle.

He therefore carried him and his princes to Babylon, which was become “a city of merchants in a land of traffick,” being very prosperous under the rule of Nebuchadnezzar. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, Deut. xxviii. 49—57, v. 49. 2 Kings xxiv. 8—16. Jer. xxii. 24—27.)—The word rendered traffick, is Canaan, which signifies trade, or merchandise. (Zeph. i. 11. Heb. Zech. xiv. 21. John ii. 16.)

V. 5, 6. The conqueror did not at that time further oppress or enslave the Jews; nor place over them any of his own princes: but he took Mattaniah of the family of David, Josiah’s younger son, the uncle of Jeconiah; and having engaged him by covenant, and by a solemn oath in the name of JEHOVAH, to be faithful to him; and having changed his name to Zedekiah, which signifies “the righteousness of JEHOVAH,” he made him king over the nation. (2 Kings xxiv. 17.) Thus he planted of the seed of the land in a fruitful field, as a willow flourishes when planted by great waters. And though the kingdom was depressed and dependent; yet Zedekiah’s situation was so favourable, and the conditions granted him so moderate, that by keeping of the covenant, it might have stood. Indeed, for a time this twig grew, and became a spreading vine of low stature: and so long as Zedekiah and his princes were willing to depend on the king of Babylon, and to submit to him, the Jews enjoyed peace and recovered strength, and Zedekiah prospered in his kingdom and family. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.)

A willow tree. (5) נֶחְמֶשׁ. The meaning of this word is doubtful; some render the clause, “He set it very circumspectly.” Nebuchadnezzar took every precaution to prevent Zedekiah’s revolting from him. (Marg. Ref. on 12, 13.)

V. 7, 8. The other great eagle was Pharaoh-hophra king of Egypt, who was as ambitious and rapacious as Nebuchadnezzar, but not so powerful. This eagle had great wings and many feathers, but not equal to those of the other eagle. Yet the vine bent its roots, and shot its branches towards it; in order to be watered “by the furrows of its plantation.” This may refer to the inundations of the Nile, and the manner in which Egypt was watered. Zedekiah planned a revolt from the king of Babylon, and entered into an alliance with the king of Egypt; either

9 Say thou, Thus saith the Lord God; ^k Shall it prosper? ^l shall he not pull up the roots thereof, and cut off the fruit thereof, that it wither? it shall wither in all the leaves of her spring, ^m even without great power or many people to pluck it up by the roots thereof.

10 Yea, behold, being planted, shall it prosper? ⁿ shall it not utterly wither, when the east wind toucheth it? it shall wither in the furrows where it grew.

11 ¶ Moreover the word of the Lord came unto me, saying,

12 Say now ^o to the rebellious house, ^p Know ye not what these things mean? tell them, ^q Behold, the king of Babylon is come to Jerusalem, and hath taken the king thereof, and the princes thereof, ^r and led them with him to Babylon;

13 And ^s hath taken of the king's seed, and made a covenant with him, and hath ^t taken an oath of him, ^u he hath also taken the mighty of the land:

14 That ^v the kingdom might be base, that it might not lift itself up, ^w but that ^x by keeping of his covenant it might stand.

15 But ^y he rebelled against him ^z in sending his ambassadors into Egypt, that they might give him horses and much people. ^a Shall he prosper? ^b shall he escape that doeth such things? ^c or shall he break the covenant, and be delivered?

16 As I live, saith the Lord God, surely in the place where the king dwelleth that made him king, ^d whose oath he despised and whose covenant he brake, ^e even with him in the midst of Babylon he shall die.

17 Neither ^f shall Pharaoh, with his mighty army and great company, make for him in the war, ^g by casting up mounts, and building forts, to cut off many persons:

18 Seeing he despised the oath by breaking the covenant, (when, ^h lo, he had given his hand,) and hath done all these things, ⁱ he shall not escape.

19 Therefore thus saith the Lord God; As I live, ^k surely mine oath that he hath despised, and my covenant that he hath broken, even it will I recompense upon his own head.

20 And ^l I will spread my net upon him, and he shall be taken in my snare, and I will bring him to Babylon, and will ^m plead with him there, for his trespass that he hath trespassed against me.

21 And ⁿ all his fugitives with all his bands shall fall by the sword, and they that remain shall be scattered to-

hoping to recover independence by his assistance; or preferring to be his vassal rather than Nebuchadnezzar's, as expecting greater prosperity and security under him. But he had no sufficient, or even plausible reason for this treacherous conduct; being already in such a situation, as would have enabled him to reign in credit, and to be useful to his people. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, 13—21. 2 Kings xxiv. 20. 2 Chr. xxxvi. 13. Jer. xxxvii. 1—5.)

V. 9, 10. It could not be expected, that this vine should prosper: the eagle that planted it would certainly root it up, destroy all its fruit, and cause all its leaves to wither, even in the spring when other trees looked green: and this would be done very easily, as a small force suffices to pull up a newly planted vine by the roots. Though it had been carefully planted, and was well watered, yet it would soon wither in its place, as a tree by the blast of the unwholesome east wind. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 15—21. xix. 10—13.)

V. 12. Know ye not, &c.] 'Will ye not apply your minds to understand what God speaks to you? and that, whether he direct his speech to you in plain words, or in riddles and parables? (xii. 2. 9. xx. 49.)' Lowth. (Marg. Ref.—Note, 2.)

V. 13, 14. Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, 3—6.—Mighty, &c. (13) 'As hostages for the performance of the covenants, agreed between him and Zedekiah.' Lowth.—Base. (14) Or low. It is the same word before used (6). A tributary kingdom dependent on the king of Babylon: so that Zedekiah was in less honourable circumstances than any of his predecessors. (Note, xxix. 14, 15.) Submission, however, to Providence would have been his duty, even if he had not engaged by covenant and oath to be faithful to Nebuchadnezzar.

V. 15—21. Zedekiah and his people expected to prosper by their worldly policy; but would God permit such perfidy and perjury to go unpunished? He had given the power into Nebuchadnezzar's hand: Zedekiah had accepted the kingdom upon the terms proposed to him, and had ratified the covenant with a solemn oath: and then he did not hesitate to break it, that he might form an alliance with another heathen king! And ought he to escape punishment, who did such things? or to be delivered by his base perfidy? (Marg. Ref. y—c.—Sec on Note, 5, 6. Notes, xxi. 23—27.) The Lord therefore swore by himself, as the living God, (whom Zedekiah had called to witness, when he swore allegiance to the king of Babylon.)

that he should die in captivity at Babylon; especially for despising his oath, and breaking his covenant. Nor should Pharaoh, whose formidable preparations threatened the destruction of the Chaldeans, do Zedekiah any good, but should rather occasion the destruction of greater numbers of the Jews: for the Lord himself would fight against them to their ruin. (Marg. Ref. d—o.—Notes, xii. 8—15. vv. 13, 14. 2 Kings xxiv. 17. 20. xxv. 1—7. Jer. xxi. 1—7. xxxiv. 1—5. xxxvii. 1—5. 6—10, v. 10.)—Though Zedekiah's oath had been given to a heathen, a conqueror, and a tyrant; and many plausible reasons might have been assigned for violating it; yet God considered Zedekiah's conduct as a most aggravated sin against him, and was determined to punish him for it: "Surely mine oath hath he despised; and my covenant hath he broken."—What shall we then say to the maxim, that faith is not to be kept with hereticks? or that any human power can absolve men from the obligations of a solemn oath?

By casting up, &c. (17) The Jews, expecting help from Pharaoh, persisted in the determination to defend the city, and to employ every means of fortifying it, against the assailants: but these efforts served only to prolong and increase their miseries, and multiply the number of those who perished during the siege and after the taking of the city. (Marg. Ref. g.)

V. 22—24. The Lord would not, however, forget his engagements to the family of David, while he punished this degenerate branch of it. He would plant a tender shoot cropped from the highest branch of this high cedar. Some refer this to Zerubbabel, who ruled over the Jews after the captivity: but if he were at all meant, it could only be as a type of Christ. This plant, was first at his incarnation apparently a tender one; but after his humiliation, sufferings, and death, he was exalted to the right hand of the Father, and made "Head over all things to his church;" and thus became a "Plant of renown." (Marg. Ref. p, q.—Notes, Ps. lxxx. 14, 15. Is. ix. 6, 7. xi. 1—10. lii. 13—15. liii. 1—3. 9—12. Zech. vi. 12, 13.) The high and eminent mountain, on which he was planted, signified the Christian church, of which mount Zion was the type. There he grows, as "the true Vine," or as the stately Cedar, or both in one, and all his people are united to him, and live in him. Under the shadow and among the branches of this tree, "dwell all fowl of every wing:" that is, sinners of every nation, rank, and character find refuge in Christ. And all the inhabitants of the earth, and especially the rulers of it, will know the power, truth, justice, and love of God, in these events; in bringing down the kingdom of David when it was exalted, and withering it when it flourished; and then in exalting it from its depressed state, and causing it to flourish when it was withered. Or the high and green tree may refer to the kingdom of Babylon and all those other kingdoms, which have been and will be destroyed to make way for the kingdom of Christ. (Marg. Ref. r—y.—Notes, xxi. 23—27, vv. 26, 27. xxxiv. 23—31. Is. ii. 2—5. Dan. ii. 34, 35. 44, 45. vii. 13, 14. 23—27. Am. ix. 11, 12. Zech. viii. 20—23. John xv. 1—8. 1 Cor. xv. 20—28. Rev. xi. 15—18.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The greatest exploits of mighty conquerors, when impartially represented, resemble the ravages of birds and beasts of prey; except as their power and success render them more extensively destructive, and as they devour their own species. But they are employed by a righteous God, to perform a part of his grand design; and till their work be done, they prosper in their enterprizes.—It is far more desirable to be like "a spreading vine of low stature" which brings forth fruit, than to prosper in doing evil: and if we be "planted in the courts of the LORD," if our branches turn towards him, and our roots draw nourishment from him; we shall be "like a tree planted by the rivers of waters, which bringeth forth its fruit in due season." (Notes, Ps. i. 1—3. xcii. 12—15. Jer. xvii. 5—8, vv. 7, 8.) And should we be kept poor and obscure, and live hardly by honest industry: we shall notwithstanding be more comfortable, as well as more useful, than the most successful of the ungodly. But they, who depart from God, can only vary and multiply their crimes, by exchanging one carnal confidence for another: and, notwithstanding their fair prospects and sanguine hopes, they never can attain to durable prosperity.—Princes and politicians are very apt to trifle with solemn oaths and treaties, and to devise specious pretences for violating them: but the Lord "will not hold them guiltless, who thus take his name in vain:" and few of them will be able to plead more plausibly for perfidy and perjury, than Zedekiah might have done; against whom these awful threatenings were denounced, for breaking his covenant with the king of Babylon, and "despising the oath" sworn to him.—Rulers and nations seldom prosper who commit atrocious crimes: but no man shall escape the righteous judgment of God, who dies under the unrepented guilt of such iniquity and impiety: for, as sure as the Lord liveth, he will recompense them upon the sinner's head; and the sinful methods, which men take of extricating themselves out of dif-

God reproves the Jews for using the proverb of sour grapes, 1—4. He shews his dealings with a righteous man, 5—9; with the wicked son of a righteous father, 10—13; and with the righteous son of a wicked father, 14—18. He will deal with each individual according to his character, 19, 20. The wicked, if he repent, shall live, 21—23; and the righteous, if he apostatize, shall die, 24. He shews the equity of his dealings, and the iniquity of the Jews, 25—29. He earnestly exhorts them to repent, in the prospect of being judged according to their ways, 30—32.

sculties, are sure to entangle them in snares and nets, to their great misery or ruin.—Blessed be God, our Redeemer, to whom all the prophets bare witness, differs wholly from these degenerate branches of the family of David. His word is truth, his arm is power, and his heart is love. He is "planted upon a high and eminent mountain," that he may be conspicuous even to the ends of the earth: he is loaded with most precious fruit: sinners of every name find refuge from the wrath to come and from every enemy and danger, under his shadow: and believers not only partake of his precious fruits, but are also made fruitful by him; yea, many of them are "filled with all the fruits of righteousness, which are through him to the praise and glory of God the Father." May every power, however flourishing and exalted, which opposes his cause, be brought low and withered: may his kingdom be exalted and prosper; and may the whole earth behold and be filled with his glory, Amen and Amen.

NOTES.

CHAP. XVIII. V. 2. God had declared, both in the law and by the prophets, that he would punish the sins of the fathers upon the children, unto several generations. He had traced back the ruin of the ten tribes to the idolatry of Jeroboam, who made Israel to sin, by establishing the worship of the golden calves; (Notes, 2 Kings xiv. 15, 16. Hos. v. 11, 12;) and he had charged the ruin of Judah on the sins of Manasseh. (Notes, 2 Kings xxiii. 26, 27. xxiv. 3, 4. Jer. xv. 2—4.) This was originally intended as an additional preservative from iniquity, especially from idolatry, which was likely to descend to their posterity, and entail judgments on them: it was an argument of the Lord's patience; for he would not immediately cast off his people, upon the first forfeiture of the covenant. It referred entirely to temporal calamities; and supposed, that the generation, on which divine judgments were executed, imitated or exceeded the sins of their parents. 'God expressly threatens to visit the sins of the fathers upon the children, both in the Old and New Testament; (Ex. xx. 5. Matt. xxiii. 35;) but this is to be understood only with respect to the temporal punishments of this world, ... not with respect to the eternal punishments of the next.' Lowth.—'The scripture takes notice of a certain measure of iniquity, which is filling up from one generation to another; till at last it makes a nation or family ripe for destruction. And although those persons, on whom this vengeance falls, suffer no more than their own personal sins deserved: yet, because the sins of former

'generations, which they equal or outdo, make it time for God utterly to destroy them; the punishments due to the 'sins of many ages and generations are said to fall upon 'them.' Sherlock, quoted by Lowth. But the Jews, being proudly disposed to justify themselves, and impiously to arraign the divine conduct, spake and acted as if they had been free from guilt, and suffered wholly for their fathers' sins: whereas their abominations far exceeded those of any former generation of Israel. With a mixture therefore of profaneness and wit, they invented a proverb, which soon came into common use. This implied that wickedness indeed merited punishment, and suffering might be expected as the effect of sin; even as the teeth being set on edge was the ordinary consequence of eating sour grapes: but that it was their hard case, that their fathers had enjoyed the pleasure (such as it was,) of committing sin, and they had the pain of being punished for it: as if their guilty parents had wholly escaped with impunity; and as if themselves had been entirely blameless! (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Jer. xxxi. 29, 30. Lam. v. 7.)

V. 3, 4. In the most solemn manner, the Lord assured the people, that he would bring this proverb into entire disuse, by exposing their crimes to publick view, at the time when he executed vengeance upon them. It was absurd, as well as profane, to suppose, that he would punish the innocent instead of the guilty; seeing he had as Creator, a sovereign right and power to deal with all men as he pleased. The life or soul of one man was as much regarded by him, as that of another: he had the life or soul of the father as absolutely at his disposal, as that of the son; and he could have no motive for letting the one escape with impunity, in order to punish the other in his stead.—But "the soul that sinneth, it shall die." According to the law, death, temporal and eternal, is the wages of every sin: and the impenitent sinner remains under this condemnation notwithstanding the gospel.—Some commentators explain this of the temporal death, which was about to come on the wicked Jews, by sword, famine, and pestilence; and they would confine the whole chapter to these events. But it cannot be proved, that every righteous man escaped those temporal judgments, or that all who survived them were righteous. (Note, xxi. 2—5, vv. 3, 4.) Many indeed of the pious Jews had "their lives given to them for a prey:" but even what Jeremiah, Baruch, and others endured, in the siege and after the taking of Jerusalem, nearly equalled the external sufferings of many wicked men among them; and not one of those, who survived the siege, escaped captivity or exile.

So that facts did not fully ascertain the equality of the divine conduct towards these distinct characters. The miseries, which the infants suffered during the siege; and the circumstances of such of them as survived and grew up in captivity, and at a distance from the estates and comforts which otherwise they would have inherited, demonstrate, that in temporal things the children actually did suffer for the sins of their parents, even though they did not imitate their crimes: nay, when they themselves were righteous persons. The same has always been the case as to temporal things: nor can even infidels deny the stubborn facts, which prove, that the crimes of parents entail sufferings on their children. Indeed it must be allowed by men of all creeds and systems. (Note, Ex. xx. 5.) Instead therefore of temporal dispensations being all that is intended, in this remarkable chapter; it is evident that these were not at all meant, or in a very subordinate manner: for though Israel, as a nation, was under a peculiar dispensation, as to temporal prosperity and adversity; yet it appears, from various testimonies of the Old Testament, that individuals were not uniformly prospered or afflicted, according to their characters. (Ps. lxxiii. 1—17. Eccles. ix. 1, 2.) But in the great concerns of eternity every man was, is, and will be dealt with, according as his works evince him to have been, under the old covenant of works, or the new covenant of grace; which is enough for the entire justification of the divine conduct, whatever temporal calamities men endure, through the sins of others: seeing they deserve for their own sins, more than all which they thus suffer; and the Lord over-rules every event for the eternal good of believers.—The use of the singular number, through the whole of this argument, tends also to confirm this sentiment; as the case of individuals, and not that of the nation at large, was evidently intended. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 19, 20. Rom. vi. 21—23.)—‘As “life” signifies in general all that happiness, which attends God’s favour; so “death” denotes all those punishments, which are the effects of the divine displeasure, under which are comprehended the miseries of the ‘next world.’ Lowth.

V. 5—9. Some expositors explain these verses, as merely relating to a man’s outward conduct, which entitled him to exemption from national judgments: but external good behaviour, while the heart remains unchanged and at enmity against God, is hypocrisy; and God would never thus solemnly have pronounced a mere hypocrite to be “righteous,” or entitled to any reward. (9. Notes, Matt. vi. 1—4. xxiii. 25—28.) On the other hand, the way of justification before God is not the subject; nor yet the source of the discrimination which takes place in men’s characters, who are all of the same fallen nature. But it is taken for granted, that there are righteous persons on earth; and their character and conduct are described; which is very commonly done both in the Old and the New Testament. (Notes, Ps. xxiv. 3—6. Rom. ii. 7—11. Rev. xxii. 14, 15.) The upright servant of God, that is, the true believer, would do justice and judgment; for the divine law would be the rule of his conduct. Reverential fear and love of God would effectually keep him from eating of the sacrifices offered upon the mountains to idols: and he would bring his oblations in penitent faith to the temple; and there feast on his peace-offerings with a thankful heart. He would not “lift up his eyes” in adoration of the base idols, which the house of Israel madly worshipped. So far from committing adultery, he would consult expediency, and obey the law of God, even in lawful marriage. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. g—k.) He would by no means oppress the poor, by retaining their pledges, or exacting usury contrary to the law, or by fraud or violence: he would not only be strictly and conscientiously honest; but he would liberally contribute to the necessities of the needy: he would use his influence and authority to execute justice betwixt man and man; habitually walk in God’s ordinances and commandments, stand at a distance from all kind of iniquity, and act uniformly as the spiritual worshipper and devoted servant of the Lord. (Marg. Ref. l—r.—Notes, Job xxix. 12—17. xxxi. 1—4. 9—32.)—Those who speak as if a man might do all this, without faith or special grace, unwarily concede more to those who deny man’s total depravity, than they intend.—Such a course of conduct formed, under that dispensation, the proper evidence of a man’s conversion, and that he was a true believer and an heir of eternal life. Indeed the New Testament scarcely affords a more distinguishing description of the believer's conduct to God and man. As therefore, "he that doeth righteousness is born of God;" and "he that doeth righteousness is righteous;" and as living faith is known by its fruits, and distinguished from a dead faith: so God would certainly adjudge him, whose character, in his sight, answered to this description, to be a righteous man, and an heir of eternal life. (Marg. Ref. s—u.—Notes, Luke i. 6. Gal. vi. 6—10, vv. 7, 8. Jam. ii. 14—26. 1 John ii. 26—29, v. 29. iii. 7—10.)

V. 10—13. If this very man, who so satisfactorily had "shewn his faith by his works," had a son, whose character and conduct were the reverse of his father's; which might be the case, notwithstanding the good example set, and the good instructions given him: if he were a robber, a murderer, an adulterer, or idolater, an oppressor, or usurer, or guilty of other abominations: could it be expected that he should escape the vengeance of God on account of his father's piety? Surely not: though he might for a time fare better for it in this world, yet he would at length perish with deeper aggravation, and have none but himself to blame for his destruction. 'The cause of his ruin is in himself.'—Josiah was an eminently righteous father, whose children were notoriously wicked; yet the difference as to this world was not so great between him and them, as to accord to the total contrariety of their characters. He died in battle at the age of thirty-nine; and Jehoiakim, the most wicked of his sons, was slain at the age of thirty-six: but the one died in peace and went to glory; the other was cut off in his sins. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, Ex. xxii. 25—27. Deut. xxiv. 10—13. Neh. v. 1—13.—2 Kings xxiii. 29, 30. Jer. xxii. 13—19.)

V. 14—17. (Notes, 5—13.) It seems peculiarly absurd to explain this of the single generation of Israel in which the prophet lived, and of the temporal judgments that awaited the Jews; when a succession of generations is expressly supposed, in the illustrations given of the divine conduct. Should such a wicked man, as had been described, have a son, who witnessing his father's sins, instead of imitating them, duly considered the evil of them; and so was led conscientiously to avoid them, and to walk before God, as the righteous man before described did; relaxing even the hard impositions, that had been laid upon the poor by his father, as soon as he had it in his power: this man would by no means perish for his father's sins. If indeed he lived in a time of publick calamity, he could not avoid many temporal evils; and he might perhaps suffer famine, poverty, or captivity; or "be taken away from the evil to come:" but, as a true believer, "a doer of the word, he would be blessed in his deed," and his soul would finally be saved. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.) Thus Hezekiah considered his father's sins, and shunned them: so that his character was a perfect contrast to that of Ahaz. (2 Chr. xxviii—xxxii.)

V. 18. Marg. Ref.—Note, 10—13.

V. 19, 20. Notwithstanding this condescension of the Lord, in explaining his dealings to the people; he foresaw they would still object, that it was evident the son did bear the iniquity of the father. To this he answered, that the son, who had not copied his father's sins, but had lived a godly life, should surely be saved; and that they only should perish who had themselves deserved it. 'He that doeth righteously shall be ... graciously accepted; he that doeth evil shall receive according to the wickedness he hath committed.' Bp. Hall.—Let it again be observed, that the question here is not about the meritorious ground of justification, but about the Lord's dealings with the righteous and the wicked. (Marg. Ref.—See on Notes, 5—9. 14—17.—Notes, Ec. viii. 11—13. Is. iii. 10, 11.)

V. 21, 22. In order to evince more undeniably the mercy, as well as the equity, of God's dealings with his creatures, it is here further declared that the wicked man himself, if he turned from his evil ways, would certainly be saved. (Note, iii. 17—19.)—'If that man, who hath been formerly wicked, shall now prove truly penitent, and turn from all his sins, and live holily, ... he shall surely live and not die.' Bp. Hall.—'He joineth the observation of the commandments with repentance; for none can repent indeed, except he labour to keep the law.'—The true penitent is also a true believer; and as to the grand question of acceptance with God unto eternal life, none of his former transgressions shall be any more mentioned unto him; but "in the righteousness which he hath done," as the fruit of faith and the effect of conversion, he shall surely live.—How enervated does it render the passage, to explain it, that his sins should not be mentioned against him to his temporal punishment, though they might to his eternal damnation! (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 26, 27. xxxiii. 14—16. Prov. xxviii. 13. Jer. xxxi. 33, 34. 1. 20. Heb. viii. 7—13, vv. 10—12. x. 11—18, vv. 16, 17. Jam. i. 22—25.)

V. 23. 'Is it any pleasure to me, that men should be wicked; or that those which are now wicked men should die everlastingly? Is it not rather my desire that men should repent, and that the repentant should live? Is not this the very sum of my gospel, which I send into the world? Do I not call, and cry, and sue to men, that they would return from their sins, and be saved?' Bp. Hall. This is sufficient to encourage the humble penitent, and to silence the obstinate rebel: and these are condescending methods of illustrating the divine dispensations, by a reference to human affairs. The original may be rendered, "Do I greatly delight that the wicked should die? saith the Lord God; and do I not greatly delight, that he should return from his ways and live?" God does greatly delight in shewing mercy to the penitent: (Marg. Ref. f:) he greatly approves their repentance, and takes pleasure in their happiness: but he abhors the conduct of the impenitent; and punishes them, not because he delights in their misery, but for the display of his own glory, and the general good of his universal and everlasting kingdom. The most clement and benevolent prince finds it necessary and incumbent on him, to punish with death those criminals, who endanger the safety of the state, and the peace and happiness of his loyal subjects: but it is a painful duty; while he feels much pleasure in the good conduct of his people, and in shewing mercy as far as it can be done with propriety. Whereas, there have been many tyrants, who delighted in the crimes of their subjects, as giving them occasion to gratify their malignity in tortures and executions. Every dispensation of Providence, and especially the whole plan of salvation, shews that God delights in the salvation and happiness of sinners; and that he has done all which was consistent with his own glory, to prevent the necessity, so to speak, of executing vengeance. He could doubtless convert and save all men, and all devils; but he has wise reasons for not doing it. Yet it must not be inferred, that he will not execute his threatenings on the impenitent: nay, the opposition between the two parts of the verse strongly implies, that they, who do not return from their evil ways, shall certainly perish. Nor can we conceive for a moment, that the destruction of the wicked will in the least degree interrupt the perfect blessedness of the infinite God: nay, many scriptures shew, that he takes pleasure in the display of his glory by punishing obstinate rebels; though he far more delights in mercy. And will not men allow God to delight in mercy, unless he shew mercy in all possible cases, to the exclusion of his holiness, justice, truth, and wisdom, as the moral Governor of the world? Will they not allow him to be omnipotent, because he has not created all the worlds, which possibly might have been created? May he not be allowed to be good, because he has not absolutely excluded evil from the creation, which he doubtless could have done? All such objections are the offspring of pride, ignorance, unbelief, and enmity: and whilst vain men would be wise, they are often little aware that they are running into direct blasphemy. In respect both of temporal and eternal retributions, infinite wisdom directs, and seems (but only seems) to limit the exercise of divine goodness and mercy. (Marg. Ref. e.—Notes, 30—32, v. 32. xxxiii. 11. Is. xxx. 18, 19. Jon. iv. 1—4, v. 2. Mic. vii. 18—20, v. 18. 1 Tim. ii. 3, 4. 2 Pet. iii. 9. 1 John iv. 7, 8, v. 8.)

'men's evil ones: (xxxiii. 13:) so that they thought it a 'hard case for a man, who had been righteous the far 'greatest part of his life, if he did at last commit iniquity,
'that his former righteousness should avail him nothing.
'In opposition to this doctrine, God here declares, that a 'righteous man sinning and not repenting, should die in 'his sins, and that a wicked man upon his repentance, 'should save his soul alive.' Lowth.—Notwithstanding this plain declaration, it is obvious that the notion, current among the Jews, is equally current among an immense majority of professed Christians; though directly opposite to the whole doctrine of scripture, and even subversive of it. For the condemnation of every transgressor by the holy law, salvation by free grace, justification by faith through the righteousness, atonement, and mediation of Christ, the necessity of regeneration, the sinfulness of all the supposed good works of the unregenerate and unbelieving, and the great and many defects of the real good works of true believers, with many other doctrines essential to Christianity, must be entirely set aside, before such a scheme of final retribution can be made so much as plausible. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 21—24. iii. 20, 21. xxxiii.

V. 28. We have here, as it were, the beginning and progress of repentance. The man is "come to himself," and he considers, where he is, what he has done, and against whom he has offended: he considers the evil, number, and desert of his sins; what cause he has to be humbled and alarmed; and what need he has of repentance, conversion, forgiveness, and newness of life. In consequence he turns from all his transgressions, and obtains mercy.—Is not this the very same repentance, which is delineated in the parable of the Prodigal Son?
(Marg. Ref.—Notes, Ps. cxix. 57—63, vv. 58—60. Ec.
vii. 13, 14. Jer. xxxi. 18—20. Hag. i. 5—11. Luke xv.
17—21.)

V. 30—32. The Lord, having thus stated the measure of his dealings with every individual, proceeds to assure the Israelites, that he will judge "each of them according "to his ways:" thus it is every where declared, that the Lord will judge every man, at the last day, according to his works. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. u—z.) On this he grounds an earnest exhortation to them to repent, and turn from all their transgressions; to cast them all away from them; and even to "make them a new heart and a "new spirit." This certainly implies the same thing as regeneration, and a new creation unto holiness: and though man cannot effect this change in himself by any power of his own; yet that temper, to which regeneration restores us, is required of every one by the holy law of God; and the essence of our depravity and apostasy consists in being of the contrary temper. (Marg. Ref. a—c.—Notes, 5—9.

CHAP. XIX.

A lamentation over the ruin of the royal family of

and the performance of every Christian duty. It must be effected, or iniquity will be the sinner's ruin: the less a sinner can do of himself, the more need he has to beg of God to work it in him: ordinances and means are appointed, directions and promises are given; in order that they, who desire this change, may seek it from God. This is as much man's duty, and as proper a subject for exhortation, as faith, repentance, love to God or man, or any other spiritual service, which the carnal mind can no more perform, than effect this new creation. Indeed exhortations to the same import are found repeatedly in the New Testament. (Notes, Matt. xii. 33—37, v. 33. xxiii. 25—28. Jam. iv. 7—10, v. 8.) The Israelites were therefore commanded to do these things, in order that they might be convinced of their own depravity, inability, and misery; and that they might learn to value the promises of God to this effect, and plead them in prayer. (Notes, xxxvi. 37. Ps. li. 10. Jer. xvii. 14. xxxi. 18—20, v. 19. Lam. v. 19—22, v. 21.) In this sense such exhortations are similar to Christ's command to the paralytick to "take up his bed and walk:" depending on his help, who gave the command, he attempted obedience, and found himself enabled to perform it. But the sinner's inability is criminal: he might justly be left under condemnation: and when the gospel "commands all men every where to repent;" and they so love their sins, and are so proud, that they will not come to him who is exalted to give repentance; they seem resolved to die, as a person who has taken poison and refuses the antidote. And it is the height of human presumption and impiety, for men to charge their ruin upon God, when they so criminally despise his law, and neglect the salvation of his gospel.—The prophets often exhort the Jews to an inward purity and holiness; thereby to take them off from relying on an outward legal righteousness (4). ... By thus instructing them in a more excellent way of serving God, than the ceremonial law did directly prescribe; they prepared their minds for receiving those truths, which the gospel would more fully discover. God promises (xxxvi. 26,) to "give them a new heart, &c." here he exhorts them to "make themselves a new heart and a new spirit:" which difference of expression is thus to be reconciled, that although "God works in us to will and to do;" and is the first Mover in our regeneration; yet we must work together with his grace; at least willingly receive it, and not quench or resist its motions.' Lowth.—Ruin. (31) מְצִיבָה: often rendered "stumbling block." (Notes, xiv. 1—5, v. 4. Is. viii. 11—15, vv. 14, 15.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—20.

It is not more natural for fallen man to commit wickedness, than it is to excuse or justify it, and to throw the blame on others. Thus men venture to charge God with injustice, rather than condemn themselves; and either deny, that future vengeance awaits them, or consider themselves punished, in this and all their sufferings, for the sin of Adam: as if they had not imitated him, and broken the law of God as well as he!—Acute wit is very different from heavenly wisdom; and it is often employed as a most dangerous weapon against religion, to the ruin of many, especially of the impious possessor.—Detached sentences of scripture, and instances in providence, may be adduced and wrested to support the most detestable doctrines; and even truth itself may be stated in so crude and vague a manner, as apparently to favour the most erroneous inferences. The patience, goodness, and mercy of God to some men, are often perversely interpreted to be injustice to others: as if he might not shew mercy to whom he would, and as he would, provided he punish none above their deservings! (Note, Matt. xx. 1—16, vv. 13—15.) But the Lord will enquire of men, what they mean by their infidel and impious objections and sarcasms; and at length effectually silence them. Then the most admired infidel or profligate will have done with his witty jests and scoffs, and have them turned into "wailing and gnashing of teeth:" and "woe be to them who" thus "laugh now, for they shall weep and lament."—All souls are in the hands of the great Creator and Proprietor of the universe; and he will deal with them either in perfect equity or rich mercy: nor will any perish for the sins of another, who is in no sense worthy of death for his own. Many enquiries may here be started of cases and persons, concerning which Revelation is silent; and therefore we ought to be so, or only to say, "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" In our own case, we know that we have sinned; and our souls must as certainly sink into perdition, as our bodies must die, if the Lord should deal with us according to the requirements and sanctions of his holy law. But, blessed be his name, we are under a dispensation of mercy, and are invited to come to Christ, and to accede to the covenant of which he is the Surety. Thus sinners become righteous, and, being justified by faith, they have peace with God; his "saving grace teaches them to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world;" they learn to avoid their easily-besetting, secret, lucrative, or fashionable sins; they "do justice, love mercy, and walk humbly with God." Thus they evidence that they are justified, and may be assured that eternal life abideth in them; whether they be of Jewish or Gentile extraction, whether their parents were righteous or wicked: for "of a truth God is no respecter of persons; but in every nation, he that feareth God and worketh righteousness, is accepted of him." (Note, Acts x. 34, 35.) If this be our conduct and experience, let us give the glory of our salvation to him, and take the comfort of it in this evil world, and in the prospect of death and judgment. Indeed nothing else can give us solid satisfaction: for though there is great encouragement for us to "train up our children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord;" yet there is no absolute certainty, that they will not take bad courses, and run into those destructive abominations, which we have most conscientiously shunned, and carefully warned them against, and even persist in them to the end of life. In this case they must expect no favour for their parents' sake; but must perish, and “their blood will be upon their own heads.” But, on the other hand, no man needs to be discouraged as to his own acceptance, on account of the wickedness of his parents and progenitors; (though his constitution, estate, and temporal concerns may be impaired by it;) provided he considers and avoids their crimes, and walks in the ways of repentance, faith, and holy obedience, marked out in the sacred word.—But how absurd is the conduct of those, who are satisfied with any superstition, idolatry, or form, or even without any religion; provided they live as their fathers did, and walk in their ways, true or false, right or wrong! (P. O. 1 Pet. i. 17—21, v. 18.) In short “the tree is known by its fruits: every tree, that bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down, and cast into the fire;” and the more fruitful we are in real good works, the more evidently it appears, that we are “trees of righteousness, the planting of the LORD, that he may be glorified.”

V. 21—32.

How amazing is the condescension of our God, in reasoning against the objections of his rebellious creatures! And how inexcusable will they be, who yet say, or think, that “his ways are unequal,” when it is so plain, that “his ways are equal and their ways unequal!” This appears with still greater evidence, when we consider that the most wicked man on earth is not excluded from his favour and eternal life by all his former sins, if he do not impenitently persist in them, or despair of mercy: for if he repent and believe the Gospel, and “turn from all his transgressions, and do that which is lawful and right, he shall save his soul alive:” none of his sins shall once be mentioned against him to his condemnation; but “in his righteousness that he hath done,” since his conversion and by the faith and grace of the gospel, “shall he live.”—As to that righteousness, from which many turn away, to commit all the abominations of the wicked, and to live and lie in them, they will by no means be profited by it; but in their trespasses and sins will they perish, and “their last state will be worse than their first.” True believers

however are preserved by God and persevere in his ways; they keep Christ’s commandments and continue in his love; they fear coming short or turning back; and thus they watch and pray, continue to the end, and are saved. And are not these ways of God equal? and what can reasonably be objected to them? As therefore he will shortly “judge every man according to his ways;” and as “he hath no pleasure in the death of a sinner, but rather that he should repent and live:” let sinners be warned, and encouraged to repent, to turn from all their transgressions, to cast them away with abhorrence, and seek to the Lord for “a new heart and a new spirit.” Without this, iniquity must be their ruin; for none will eventually be saved, except those who repent and become new creatures, and “walk in newness of life;” and none will perish, who thus turn to the Lord. Let them therefore turn these commandments and exhortations into prayers; let them trust in Christ for pardon and strength; and they will by him be enabled to do all things that pertain unto salvation. It is indeed more our interest, as well as more becoming us, to be employed in mourning over and confessing our sins, praying for grace and forgiveness, mortifying our pride and lusts, exercising ourselves unto godliness, and “doing good to all men” as we have time and opportunity; than to be disputing about hard questions, perverting the scriptures, excusing our iniquities, or replying against God.

V. 2—9. The enquiry here made, and the answer given to it, must not be understood of the mother of Zedekiah, or of the other branches of Josiah’s family, but of the Jewish nation; which is represented under the image of a lioness, because of the cruelty and oppression that generally prevailed: for the rulers and people of Judah seemed to have lost their humanity, and to have been transformed into savage beasts. The lioness lay down among lions: that is, the Jews formed alliances with the heathens, and learned their manners. Thus “she brought up her whelps among young lions:” that is, the sons of Josiah, though descended from so good a father, yet learned from the people and princes and the surrounding nations, to be ambitious, oppressive, and rapacious, like the tyrants and conquerors of the gentiles. When Josiah was slain, the people of the land made Jehoahaz king in his stead; and this lion's whelp, being advanced to royal authority, became a young lion, and soon learned to use his power in oppression and cruelty. But Pharaoh-necho and his allies came against him, and took him as a wild beast in a pit; and he was carried thence in chains into Egypt, where he died. (Marg. Ref. c.—Notes, 2 Kings xxiii. 29, 30, v. 30. 33. Jer. xxii. 10—12.) And when the people saw there were no hopes of his return, they submitted to Jehoiakim, whom Pharaoh had appointed to be king. Thus he became their young lion, and used his power for eleven years most cruelly; desolating the palaces, cities, and country, by the terror of his oppressions. At length he drew on him the hatred and vengeance of the king of Babylon, and that of the neighbouring nations; and he was taken prisoner, and ended his life miserably: so that the terror of his roaring no more disturbed the mountains of Israel. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, 2 Kings xxiii. 34. 37. xxiv. 1, 2. Jer. xxii. 13—19. xxvi. 16—24. xxxvi. 30—32.)—The captivity of Jeconiah, and that of Zedekiah, are not here expressly mentioned. Jeconiah reigned a very short time, and Zedekiah seems rather to have been a timid and deceitful, than a tyrannical prince.

V. 10—13. The Jewish nation and their princes are here represented under the emblem of a vine, with many branches.—The expression, “in thy blood,” is obscure, and differently interpreted. Some say, that blood was commonly put at the roots of vines to enrich the soil, and render them more fruitful. “In thy quietness.” (marg.) ‘Thy mother is like a vine, in the time of her first peaceable plantation.’ Bp. Hall. So long as Judah continued to behave peaceably, the nation flourished: nay, so long as Zedekiah and his subjects quietly submitted to Nebuchadnezzar, they enjoyed many blessings, which they forfeited by revolting. (Notes, xvii.) This vine was planted by many waters, became fruitful, had many branches, and among them strong rods for sceptres; that is, powerful princes had reigned over them, under whom Judah appeared very considerable among the neighbouring kings and nations. But at length the Lord, in anger, had plucked it up, thrown it on the ground, and left it, with all its strong rods, to wither and be burned. That is, the strength and prosperity of the kingdom were decayed and come to nothing. The remnant of this vine was now planted in a barren and dry land: her branches were continually consumed; her princes were slain and carried away captive; and there were none left, except a succession of inexperienced, feeble, and worthless princes, who were speedily about to be entirely deprived of the throne. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xvi.)

V. 14. ‘A destruction is risen from among themselves, even from the treachery of Zedekiah, which hath utterly destroyed the remainder of her hopes; so that now there is no more likelihood of any of the royal blood being exalted to the government.’ Bp. Hall.—‘This is matter of present lamentation, and shall be so to after times.’ Lowth. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Those, who associate with ungodly and abandoned persons, will soon be assimilated to them: and when professors of religion form such connexions, their children generally grow up in conformity to the worst maxims and fashions of a wicked world. Having cast off the fear of God, they often seem to be divested even of humanity, and to be transformed into savage beasts: and that most noble and royal blood, of which so many are proud, only distinguishes them, as lion's whelps from the other beasts of prey.—Advancement to authority discovers the ambition and selfishness of men's hearts: and many know no use of power, except as it enables them to “catch the prey,” and devour their own species. But those who are thus the plague and terror of their neighbours, may expect to be hated and terrified in their turn: they are often hunted and laid wait for like wild beasts; and as they spend their lives in mischief, they generally end them by violence. Yet men proceed in the same bloody track, without profiting by the example of their predecessors!—It is, and must be “for a lamentation,” that pious and useful families so soon degenerate, and flourishing churches and nations are so speedily rooted up and withered. But in all these events the Lord is righteous: and his anger dries up and consumes the prosperity of the most flourishing sinners.—Yet, blessed be God, one Branch of the vine here alluded to, is not only become “a strong Rod for the sceptre of them that bear rule,” but is himself the true and living Vine: and neither he, nor any of his fruitful branches, shall be rooted up, withered, or consumed for ever. This is a rejoicing, and shall be for a

CHAP. XX. V. 1—3. 'All the prophecies, recorded from the eighth chapter to this, probably belong to the sixth year of Jehoiachin's captivity.' Lowth. (Marg. Ref. a.—Note, viii. 1.)—Many conjectures have been formed about these elders, and the subject of their enquiry: but it suffices for us to know, that they were addicted to idolatry, and either that their enquiry was a mere pretence, or they vainly attempted to serve God and idols also. Therefore the Lord swore by himself, that he would not be enquired of by them. (Marg. Ref. b—e.—Note, xiv. 1—5.)

Ref. f;*) but perhaps he was thus excited and required, to act as their judge, to bring them to a trial, and, having proved their guilt, to denounce sentence in the name of God against them. In order to do this, he must set in order before them "the abominations of their fathers," of which their own conduct was an exact copy. (*Marg. Ref. g.—Notes, xvi. xviii. 2—4. xxiii. He "lifted up his hand" to them, as it was customary in solemn oaths, engaging himself to be their God, to effect their deliverance out of Egypt, and to bring them into Canaan; which he had, so to speak, searched out for them, as the most fertile and excellent land on earth; a type of heaven, that chosen inheritance of God's chosen people. their behalf: he reasonably commanded them to cast away all their abominable idols, which they looked up to and worshipped; and especially those of the Egyptians their oppressors, who could not defend their devotees against the power of JEHOVAH the God of Israel. But even there, the Israelites rebelled against him, and clave to their idols: insomuch, that he saw reason to say, that he would “pour out his fury on them in the land of Egypt;” that is, he justly might have destroyed them with the Egyptians, and certainly would, if he had dealt with them according to their deserts. But having called “Israel his son, and his “first-born,” and having undertaken his deliverance, the Egyptians would have imputed it to his want of power if he had not effected it; they would have concluded that he was not the “one true and living God,” and have been hardened in idolatry and blasphemy. Therefore, for the glory of his own name, and to make his perfections known among the Egyptians and the surrounding nations, he spared Israel, and delivered him with his mighty hand and out-stretched arm.—The honour of his truth and mercy was also concerned, and required that he should perform his promises made to their fathers. If a man, &c.] (Marg. Ref. e.—Note, Lev. xviii. 5.) The moral law shewed Israel the extent of their duty to God and man; and proved their need of mercy and grace, as well as served for the rule of their conduct: the ceremonial law shadowed forth Christ, their Righteousness and Sanctification. Those who properly attended to these judgments and statutes of the Lord, in a humble, believing, and conscientious obedience, would live in them, according to the covenant of grace: and a national observance of these laws and statutes would have ensured Israel's prosperity in Canaan. Yet the manner in which St. Paul quotes this expression (Rom. x. 5. Gal. iii. 12,) implies, that it was intended to shew the Jews, that righteousness could not be obtained by the works of the law: and this well suited the argument in this place; as it served to mark the contrariety between the holy law, the rule of obedience, and Israel's rebellious conduct. So that evidently they had no claim either to temporal advantages, or eternal life, by the law to which they trusted: as those blessings could only be claimed by such as had done according to the commandments, and not by those who had violated them all. (Notes, Matt. xix. 16—22, v. 17. Luke x. 25—29. Rom. ii. 12—16, v. 13. x. 5—11. Gal. iii. 10—14.)—‘If we understand the forementioned condition in its rigorous sense, as implying an exact and unsinning obedience, and as the word life contains the promise of eternal life under it;...as it was impossible to be performed; so no person could lay claim to eternal life, by virtue of any promise therein contained. From whence St. Paul infers the necessity of seeking to Christ, and laying hold of the promises of his gospel, for the obtaining justification and eternal life. Gal. iii. 20, 21.’ Lowth.—The promises in the Old Testament, of pardon, acceptance, and sanctification, and, in a word, of spiritual blessings, belong to the gospel, as much as those in the New Testament. (2 Cor. i. 20. Heb. vi. 17, 18. viii. 10—12. xi. 13.)

V. 12. The Lord, as a peculiar and distinguishing favour, gave Israel his sabbaths; which included the holy rest of the weekly sabbaths, and also those of the solemnities and sabbatical years. These were “signs” of their special relation to him, as his people: for at those stated times they met him with their worship, and he engaged to meet them with his blessings. They likewise marked and kept up the distinction and separation between them and the Gentiles; and conduced to bring them more acquainted with God, his perfections, truth, and holy will: so that they were appointed means of sanctification to their souls (*Marg. V. 13, 14. The people in the wilderness were continually rebelling against God: they seemed to think his service a mean and irksome employment. They preferred the worship of the golden calf, and the idols of Egypt and Moab to his statutes, which were too spiritual to suit their carnal hearts. They also greatly profaned his sabbaths: neglecting the duties of those holy days, and employing them in worldly avocations, or in secret idolatry and wickedness. So that regard to his own glory alone prevented him from utterly extirpating them in the wilderness. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Ex. xvi. 22—30. xxxii. 1—6. 11—14. Num. xi

V. 15. The Lord swore in his wrath, that none of that generation, which had despised the promised land and attempted to return into Egypt, should enter into his rest; but that they should all wander and die in the wilderness, except Caleb and Joshua. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Num. xiv. 20—33. Deut. i. 32—36. Ps. xcv. 8—11. Heb. iii. 7—13. iv. 1, 2.)

V. 16. Marg. Ref.—Notes, 13—15.—Heart. ‘They still had a hankering after the idolatries they had learned in Egypt; to which they added new idols which they had seen in the countries, through which they travelled, viz. the idols of the Midianites, Amorites, &c. Num. xv. 39. xxv. 2. Deut. xxix. 16, 17. Lowth.

V. 17. The Lord spared the rising generation, that his promises to their fathers might be fulfilled to them; whilst his wrath was poured out on those who were grown up. His purposes respecting the nation were similar in the time of Ezekiel: he was determined to destroy multitudes by his awful judgments, and to drive them all out of the land of Canaan: but he meant to preserve a remnant, whose children should again inherit the land; and to them he would fulfil his promises, especially that of the Messiah, who would be raised up among them. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, x. 3, 4. Num. xxv. 1—8. xxvi. 1, 2. Deut. iv. 3, 4. Jer. v. 19—27, v. 27. xxxi. 2—5.)

V. 18. (Notes, Deut. iv—xii. xxvi—xxxii.) The commands and exhortations here referred to occupy all these chapters; and indeed almost the whole of Deuteronomy; in which Moses, at the mouth of God, most pathetically addressed that generation of Israel, just before his death, which under Joshua was put in possession of Canaan. ‘Whereby the Holy Ghost confuteth them, that say they will follow the religion and example of their fathers, and not measure their doings by God’s word, whether they be approvable thereby or no.’

V. 19, 20. Marg. Ref.—Notes, 12—14. xviii. 14—17.

V. 21, 22. Even that generation of Israel, which grew up in the wilderness, and lived in the midst of miracles both of judgment and mercy, was frequently rebellious against the Lord, as it appears by the history of their conduct, and by the reproofs given them by Moses. It is, however, evident that they were much improved by the instructions and judgments of God; and that the generation that entered Canaan, was the best which there ever was of that favoured nation: and indeed the language concerning them, in this passage, is by no means so emphatical as that used concerning their fathers (13). Yet God might justly have destroyed them all, as he did numbers in the matter of Baal-peor; and he certainly would, had not a regard to his own glory among the surrounding nations, and to the honour of his own truth and grace, influenced him still to spare and bless them. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 7—9. Num. xxi. 4—9. xxxii. 6—15, vv. 14, 15. Josh. xxii. 21—34. xxiv. 15—32.)

V. 23, 24. The predictions of the dispersion of the Israelites, which were delivered by Moses just before his death, are evidently here referred to. They had a partial accomplishment in the Babylonish captivity; but they are far more exactly fulfilling at this day. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 16, 17. Lev. xxvi. 31—39. Deut. iv. 25—28. xxviii. 64—67. xxxii. 26, 27.)

V. 25, 26. ‘God, in a just judgment for their dis-

tutes that were not good, and judgments whereby they should not live;

26 And I ^ppolluted them in their own gifts, ^qin that they caused to pass through the fire ^rall that openeth the womb, that I might make them desolate, ^sto the end that they might know that I am the LORD.

27 ¶ Therefore, son of man, ^t'speak unto the house of Israel, and say unto them, Thus saith the Lord God; ^u"Yet in this your fathers have blasphemed me, in that they have ^{*}committed a trespass against me.

28 For ^xwhen I had brought them into the land, ^yfor ^zthe which I lifted up mine hand to give it to them, then ^z'they saw every high hill, and all the thick trees, and they offered there their sacrifices, and there they presented the provocation of their offering: there also they made their sweet savour, and poured out there their drink-offerings.

29 Then ^aI said unto them, What ^bis the high place whereunto ye go? ^aAnd the name thereof is called Bamah unto this day.

30 ¶ Wherefore say unto the house of Israel, Thus saith the Lord God; ^bAre ye polluted after the manner of your fathers? and commit ye whoredom after their abominations?

31 For when ^c'ye offer your gifts,

'obedience to his own laws, gave them up to a reprobate mind, and suffered them to walk after the idolatrous and impious customs of the heathen round about them. And whereas, by obeying the laws and ordinances which he had given them, they might have lived happily (11); they became slaves to the vile and cruel practices of the heathen idolatries: so as to offer up their very children in sacrifice to idols (26). ...I suffered them to pollute themselves (so the form Hiphil is elsewhere used in the sense of permission)...in those very gifts, which by the law they were to dedicate to my service. ...Their sin brought its own punishment along with it, destroying the hopes of families and bringing them to utter desolation.' Lowth.—The first-born by the law, were consecrated to God, but the Israelites devoted them to Baal or Molech. (Marg. Ref. p, q.)—'Because they would not obey my laws, I gave them up to themselves that they should obey their own fancies.'—It is astonishing to find many very learned and able men maintaining, that the "statutes which were not good," meant the law of Moses, or some part of it; when the prophet evidently spoke of a much later time than the giving of the law; when the context clearly explains the meaning; and when "the statutes that were not good," are expressly contrasted with the good laws of God. The giving of the law at mount Sinai could not be intended to punish sins committed by Israel more than forty years afterwards: and both the moral, the ceremonial, and the judicial law, were good for their several purposes, and salutary to the people for the time being, as far as they used them properly. (Marg. Ref. o.—Notes, 10—12. Deut. xxxii. 4. John i. 17. 2 Cor. iii. 7—11.) But God judicially left the people to be blinded by Satan, to prefer the ruinous practices of idolaters to his wise and salutary ordinances; as he is said to "send a strong delusion to believe a lie," to those who "obey not the truth, but obey unrighteousness." (Notes, xiv. 9—11. 2 Thes. ii. 8—12.) Thus he gave them up for their previous rebellion, to ripen for that destruction which he intended to bring upon them; that they might learn to know God by his judgments, seeing they had despised his mercies. (Marg. Ref. r.)

V. 27. Yet, &c.] Besides all the provocations of Israel in Egypt and the wilderness, the prophet was to charge on the nation the superstitions, idolatries, and iniquities, which they had committed in the land of Canaan. These had disparaged the perfections of God, and, as it were, blasphemed him; as if he had been less deserving of their worship than the basest idol. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.)

V. 28. As soon as the people were settled in Canaan, where they should have applied themselves to obey the commandments of God, they began to look out for high hills, or shady groves, on which to offer their sacrifices, as more solemn or more retired: and there they presented their oblations, instead of bringing them to the court of the tabernacle; as if they had intended a provocation, rather than an acceptable service. This may be understood, either of the high places, where they worshipped God in a prohibited manner; or of those, where they were guilty of idolatry. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xvi. 15—22. Judg. ii. 6—13. Ps. lxxviii. 56—60. cvi. 35—38. Is. lvii. 7, 8. Jer. ii. 21—24.)

V. 29. The Lord frequently called the people to account by his prophets, for these provocations: he enquired of them, "what the high place was," to which they went up, that they should so prefer it to his temple; he exposed the very word to odium, that it might sound as offensive in the ears of his worshippers, as a brothel does in those of a virtuous woman: yet so attached were they to these high places, throughout all their generations that they still retained the name Bamah, or the high place as the favourite appellation for the places where they sacrificed.—'The words may be expounded of some noted high place, which the Jews frequented to perform their idolatrous worship: and then the sense will be to this purpose; What is this high place, or Bamah, which you frequent? Who bade you call it so? I named my altar Mizbeach;' (the Hebrew word for altar;) 'but this place had its name from the heathen idolatry, and it still retains it.' Lowth. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—xvi. 24.)

V. 30—32. The Jews ought not to conclude, that they were about to suffer only for their fathers' sins; for they were polluted with the same idolatries and iniquities. Nay the elders who sat before the prophet (by whom the Lord would not be enquired of,) were projecting entirely to when ye make your sons to pass through the fire, ye pollute yourselves with all your idols, even unto this day: ^d and shall I be enquired of by you, O house of Israel? As I live, saith the Lord God, I will not be enquired of by you.

32 And ^e that which cometh into your mind shall not be at all, that ye say, 'We will be as the heathen, as the families of the countries, ^f to serve wood and stone.

33 As I live, saith the Lord God, ^h surely with a mighty hand, and with a stretched-out arm, and with fury poured out, will I rule over you:

34 And ⁱ I will bring you out from the people, and will gather you out of the countries wherein ye are scattered, with a mighty hand, and with a stretched-out arm, and with fury poured out.

35 And ^k I will bring you into the wilderness of the people, ^l and there will I plead with you face to face.

36 Like ^m as I pleaded with your fathers in the wilderness of the land of Egypt, so will I plead with you, saith the Lord God.

37 And I will cause you to ⁿ pass under the rod, and ^o I will bring you into ^p the bond of the covenant:

39 ¶ As for you, O house of Israel ^t thus saith the Lord God; ^u Go ye, serve ye every one his idols, and hereafter also, if ye will not hearken unto me: ^v but pollute ye my holy name no more with your gifts, and with your idols.

cast off his worship, and to conform to the idolatries of the people among whom they lived; that they might obtain their favour, share their prosperity, and escape from present affliction and reproach. But the Lord solemnly assured them, that he would not prosper them in this impious attempt: their apostasy would expose them to far severer punishment, than those people would suffer that had been educated in idolatry: they would not be considered as aliens; but as traitors and deserters, who had joined the enemy, and must expect no quarter or favour. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 1—3. xvi. 15—22, vv. 20, 21. Jer. ii. 33—37. xix. 5. xlii. 15—19.)—'God tells them, that 'he will prevent this purpose of their's from taking 'effect: and we find, that from ... the Babylonish captivity, 'they have been very cautious of committing idolatry, 'and scrupulous of making the least approaches to it.' Lowth.

V. 33—38. The Lord further declared, that he would assert his authority over his apostate people, by the powerful and terrible vengeance, which he would inflict upon them. He would separate them from the inhabitants of those countries, to which they had been driven, and with whom they attempted to unite themselves: and he would bring them into a situation, like that of their fathers in the wilderness. There he would plead his cause with them, and make them to pass under the rod, as the shepherd does the flock, when he distinguishes between the sheep and the goats, or marks out some of them for slaughter: and he would bring them into "the bond of the covenant," or deal with them according to it; enforcing the bond, and exacting the penalty, as to the obstinate rebels; and again ratifying it with the penitent and obedient, and shewing them mercy according to it. Thus he would destroy from among them the rebels; as he had done from among their fathers, previously to their entrance into Canaan; whom, having brought out of Egypt, he would not suffer to enter into the promised rest. (Marg. Ref.—Lev. xxvi. 25, 26, v. 25. Num. xiv. 27—34. Jer. ii. 8, 9. Hos. ii. 14—17. Am. iii. 1—3.)—The passage seems to refer to the whole of the Lord's dealings with Israel, from the time when this prophecy was delivered, to the establishment of a small remnant of them in their own land after the captivity; from among whom the idolaters, and idolatry itself, were completely destroyed, by their manifold desolations, and the terrible havock made among them. (Note, Is. xxvii. 7—11.) These events are accommodated to the history of Israel's being brought out of Egypt and purified in the wilderness, before they entered Canaan; though we do not find any thing in history, which seems literally to answer to the prediction: but there was a great resemblance in these two distant dispensations. Many, however, with great probability suppose, that the dealings of God with Israel and Judah, in future ages, both of judgment and mercy, are foretold.

V. 39. 'An ironical permission, full of indignation 'and rebuke; sharply upbraiding them for despising those 'many warnings God had given them; and implying that 'he was now resolved to forsake them, and give them up 'to "strong delusions," as a just judgment for their 'abuse of the means of grace, so long offered to them, 'and still rejected by them.' Lowth. In abhorrence and disdain of their wickedness, he bade them follow their beloved idols, and take the consequence, both at the present and in future. Let them do it at their peril, seeing they would not hearken to him; but let them no more profane and affront his name, by joining him with their dunghill gods, and offering sacrifices both to him and them. 'The prophet here expresses the Christian worship by 'those religious oblations, which were proper to his own 'time: as the other prophets frequently describe the 'Christian church, by representations taken from the 'Jewish temple and service. (Is. xix. 19. lvi. 7. lx. 7. lxvi. 23.)' Lowth.—God purposed to raise up to himself a large company of spiritual worshippers, when he had destroyed the rebels from among his people. He would restore Israel to their own land, and they would worship him on mount Zion, the eminent and honourable place which he had chosen.—There would they find acceptance and present their oblations; he would be honoured in them among the heathen; and they would know and worship him alone, when he had gathered them from their dispersions into their own land: for they would remember their sins and abhor themselves for them, as true penitents; and they would acknowledge, that he had dealt with them in mercy, and for the glory of his name, and not according to their deservings.—This was fulfilled in part, by their restoration from captivity; but it seems to be a prediction of the establishment of the Christian church; and also, and indeed more expressly, of the future conversion of the Jews, and their restoration to their own land. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 5—9, v. 9. xvi. 60—63. xxxvi. 20—24, v. 22. 31—36.)

V. 45—48. These verses are the beginning of another prophecy, and belong properly to the next chapter. The prophet was ordered to look southward, towards the land of Israel, especially Judah and Jerusalem: and, though he was about to prophesy against it, his word would drop, as the dew or rain: for he would speak with gravity and temper, as one who sought the conversion, and not the ruin of the people. (Marg. Ref. i.—Note, Deut. xxxii. 2.) The land of Israel, and the city Jerusalem, had been as a cultivated vineyard; but it was now become a forest, filled with unfruitful trees, abounding with beasts of prey, and about to be cut down and burned. (Marg. Ref. k.—Notes, xv. Is. v. 1—7.) For the Lord was determined to consume the whole forest, both green and dry trees together, that is, persons of all ranks and characters: (Notes, xxi. 2—5. Luke xxiii. 26—31, v. 31:) and all the inhabitants of the land, with all their allies, would be scorched or consumed by it; and thus it would be generally known, that the JEHOVAH himself had kindled the fire, and that it was in vain for man to attempt to quench it. (Marg. Ref. l—p. Matt. iii. 7—10, v. 10. John xv. 6—8, v. 6.)

V. 49. 'They make this an argument for disregarding 'what I say, that I use so many similitudes and metaphorical expressions, that they can't discover my meaning. (xii. 9.) Whereupon God commands him in the 'next chapter to speak the same thing in plain terms. Lowth. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

It is incumbent on ministers to charge men's sins upon their consciences, as well as to pray for them that they may be converted and saved: when this is done in a scriptural manner, they judge and pass sentence on the wicked; and God will ratify their decisions in heaven, and produce them at the last day; except the criminals judge and con-

damn themselves, and seek his mercy and salvation. (Note, Matt. xvi. 19.)—It is a dreadful case, when sinners provoke God to “swear in his wrath,” that he will no more be enquired of by them; and when he gives them up to their lusts and idols; determines to receive no services from them; and says of the barren fig-trees, “Let no fruit grow on you henceforth for ever.” Their condemnation then becomes irreversible, and nothing remains for them, but “a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation.” In ordinary circumstances, however, none can know this to be their case. Persons of this awful character are always hardened, either in presumption or despair: and, whilst these alarming subjects should teach us to beware of hypocrisy, no upright enquirer need be discouraged by them; for all who seek salvation in the Lord's appointed way shall certainly find it.—If he had waited till some of our fallen race had merited his favour, or appeared meet objects of his complacency; nay, till any of us had been disposed to enquire after him and return to him; not one would have been saved. His free love to rebels and enemies moved him to promise, and at length to give, the great Redeemer: he mercifully sent his word to us, as he did to Israel in Egypt: he made himself known to us, when we were “enemies in our mind by wicked works;” and, being thus “found of us when we sought him not,” he taught us to seek his favour, and an interest in his covenanted mercies. Thus he became our God and Portion, and we his worshippers and servants: his word and oath became the security of our souls, and the ground and warrant of our consolations, when we “fled for refuge to lay hold on this hope set before us:” and we then learned to expect liberty and victory, and an inheritance in that heavenly country, which he has searched out for his chosen people. But in the day, when the Lord thus makes himself known to sinners, and “of his great love, wherewith he hath loved them even when dead in sins,” (Note, Eph. ii. 4—10, v. 4.) calls them to life and salvation; he also commands them to cast away all their idols and iniquities, and to defile themselves no more with the abominations of the ungodly world around them; that they may be his people “to shew forth his praise.” Yet, if we look back to the important season, when we were first awakened to a sense of our guilt and danger; and remember our reluctance to part with our idolized interests, pleasures, and pursuits; and to bear the requisite cross, reproach, and self-denial: if we consider the opposition that our hearts made to the humbling doctrines and holy precepts of God's word; or our procrastination, and the sins which we committed against the convictions of our consciences, and the strivings of the Holy Spirit: we shall be constrained to confess, that the Lord “wrought with us, for his own name's sake,” and “for the glory of his grace;” or he would have left us even then to our own perverseness and rebellion, or have cut us off in his righteous indignation. For many of us are conscious, that, at no moment of our lives, did more of the enmity of our hearts against God, and his authority and sovereignty appear, than just before he made us willing by his power, to leave all and follow Christ.

V. 10—49.

It has been repeatedly observed, that the believer, all his journey through, is conscious of many evils in his heart, temper, and conduct; and is continually constrained to confess, that he never could have escaped destruction, if God had not “wrought with him for his own name's sake,” and not according to his own doings.” He has deserved wrath in numberless instances: and he would have turned back and perished a thousand times over, had it been possible, if he had been left to himself. He is therefore more and more disposed to “remember his ways and doings, and to loathe and abhor himself,” and to give the whole glory of his salvation, from first to last, to the mere mercy and distinguishing grace of God alone. And when he enters heaven, that happy land of promise, (which differs from Canaan, as rebellion, pollution, enemies, and sufferings are thence for ever excluded;) he is prepared to “cast his crown before the throne,” and praise redeeming love; and to offer spiritual sacrifices, in that holy mountain, suited to his obligations, and to the boundless love of his God and Saviour.

In like manner, had not God “wrought for his own name's sake,” his visible church must long since have been destroyed: but his honour is concerned in its preservation, lest his name should be profaned amongst idolaters and infidels. The Lord has given us his oracles and ordinances, his law and his gospel, for the rule of our conduct and the foundation of our hope: and they are suited, in the proper use of them, to promote our present comfort, and to direct us in the way to everlasting life. He has also given us his holy sabbaths, his own day to be kept holy, as a sign of our relation to him our Creator and Redeemer; and that, in rendering him on it the worship due to his name, we may receive from him the sanctifying grace of his Holy Spirit, to “purify us unto himself a peculiar people zealous of good works.” But wherever we look, we observe multitudes that are called Christians, who do not walk in his statutes, but despise his judgments, and greatly pollute his sabbaths. For their hearts go after their idols: worldly gain, sensual or dissipated pleasure, or other carnal objects, are eagerly pursued even on the Lord's day: and if men serve the devil, the world, and the flesh on this holy day; we cannot suppose, that they serve any better master on other days.

Alas! it is a very small remnant, even in this highly favoured land, who delight in sanctifying the day of God, because they honour and love his ordinances, truths, and precepts: and this remnant are despised as precise and narrow-minded, for obeying the plain word of God, which others generally profess to believe. Thus from time to time, the church, or different parts of it, become greatly corrupted in every respect: and the Lord gives up immense numbers to follow their own traditions, lusts, and delusions, until their very gifts and services become their greatest abominations. At length he executes his judgments upon them, as he did on Israel in the wilderness; and, having by severe discipline destroyed many of the rebels from among them, and reformed the remainder, he charges them “not to walk in the statutes of their fathers, but to keep his judgments and do them.” Then perhaps for a time spiritual religion revives: but soon the power of godliness begins to decline, dangerous errors and heresies, abominable idolatries, or immoralities creep in; and it again becomes necessary by judgments and corrections to plead against them; again to “purge out the rebels from among them,” and to bring forth a company refined as gold from the furnace; or else to take away their privileges from them, and confer them on some other people.

In these ways, God has from the beginning wrought with his church “for his name’s sake;” and has purified her from time to time, instead of utterly destroying her: and his word engages and his honour requires, that he should still have a people on earth; that “the gates of hell” should never prevail against “his church;” and that his cause should finally prevail. But those who remain so insensible and wicked amidst the means of grace, as to cast off his worship, that they may be like the heathen to serve wood and stone, or to live “without Christ” and “without God in the world,” may be assured, that they will never prosper in such an impious project. With “a mighty hand and an out-stretched arm,” the Lord will assert his authority; and if idolatrous Israelites were so severely dealt with, of how much sorer punishment will apostates from Christianity be thought worthy! The same gracious dispensation, which ensures the salvation of every believer, denounces deeper condemnation on the unbelieving and rebellious: if the rod of the covenant do not bring men to repentance, and to walk with God according to the gracious tenour of it; he will execute upon them the punishment due to the despisers of it: and if any part of his vineyard become a forest of unfruitful trees, he will soon burn it up with unquenchable fire.—Men often deride or revile the truths of God, as if they were obscure and unintelligible; when in fact they understand so much of them, as to hate the light which condemns them. But, whilst others cavil at God’s word, or form projects of rebellion: it is our wisdom to humble ourselves before him, and to beg of him to glorify himself in our salvation.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXI. V. 2—5. These verses evidently explain the parable at the close of the former chapter. (Marg. Ref. a—c.—Notes, xx. 45—49.) Jerusalem and the land of Israel were intended by “the forest of the south field.” The holy places either mean the temple and its courts; or the temple, the holy city, and the holy land. The Lord, who had so long been known by the princes of Judah “as a sure Refuge,” (Note, Ps. xlviii. 2, 3,) was at length turned against them, and was about to draw his sword, “to cut off both the righteous and the wicked.” As he had determined on this indiscriminate slaughter and devastation, he would commission his sword, (that is, the Chaldean army, the same as the fire, which was “to devour both the green and the dry trees, xx. 47,”) to go forth against all flesh, throughout the whole extent of the land. (Marg. Ref. d, e.—Notes, 9, 10. 19—22.) Thus the Jews, and indeed all nations, might know, that this destruction was not fortuitous, or merely the effect of man’s policy, ambition, or revenge: but that God had decreed it against a rebellious people, which had filled up the measure of their iniquities.—The words, “I will cut off from thee the righteous and the wicked,” cannot mean, that every individual would be slain; but all would be cut off from the land of Israel, though not out of the land of the living: however, they militate very strongly against those, who explain the eighteenth chapter, and similar passages, of an exact discrimination observed in these calamities between the righteous and the wicked. (Notes, ix. 3—7. xviii. 3, 4.) Many of the pious Jews were preserved from death during these judgments; but probably not all, nor they only: yet they were all “cut off from the land of Israel,” so that not one remained in it; for all the survivors were either carried captive to Babylon, or migrated into Egypt and other countries. But if any righteous persons fell by the sword, the famine, or the pestilence: as they were removed from the evil to come, to a better world, in mercy not in anger, all the promises and emblems, respecting the Lord’s special regard to them, might be sufficiently verified. Thus Josiah, though slain in battle, went down to the grave in peace. (Marg. Ref. f—i.—Notes, 2 Kings xxii. 15—20. xxiii. 29, 30.)

V. 6, 7. To give these awful predictions the greater emphasis, the prophet was ordered to sigh deeply and frequently, in the presence of the elders, or of the captive

Jews; as if his heart would break, or his loins were racked with pain, like the anguish of a woman in travail: as afterwards he was ordered to "cry and howl" for the same reason (12). And when the people enquired of him the cause or meaning of his bitter sighs and groans, he was ordered to answer them, that they were extorted by the tidings which he heard, and which they would soon hear, of the invasion of Judah, and of the siege and destruction of Jerusalem: for these events, which were just at hand, would exceedingly distress and intimidate the whole company, and deprive them of all courage, strength, and spirits. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, vii. 16—19. Jer. xxiii. 9—12, v. 9. Hab. iii. 16.)

V. 9, 10. The sword of war was given into the hands of the Chaldeans by the just indignation of God: and it was "sharpened," that it might do the more terrible execution; and "furbished," that its very glittering might cause the greater alarm. The Jews it seems thought that livine vengeance was become as a sword, which had grown dull and rusty in the scabbard: but they would soon learn, that it was made ready for use, and would be employed against them. Was it then a time for them to rejoice and indulge in sensual mirth, or to deride the threatenings of God? and did not their circumstances rather call on them to join the prophet in sighs and lamentations? (Marg. Ref. t—y.—Notes, Is. v. 11—17, v. 11, 12. 18, 19. xxii. 8—14. xxviii. 12—15. Am. vi. —8.)

It contemneth, &c. (10) "It makes no distinction between the sceptre and common wood; between the branches of the royal family, descended from David and Solomon, whom I honoured with the title of being my sons, (Ps. lxxxix. 26. 2 Sam. vii. 14,) and the meanest of the people." Lowth. (Marg. Ref. z.) Nebuchadnezzar would disregard Israel's relation to JEHOVAH, (Note, r. iv. 22, 23,) as well as the sceptre in the hand of David's descendants; and the sword of God's righteous vengeance would cut down Zedekiah and his family, like any other of the trees of the forest.—Or, "It is the rod "of my Son, it despiseth every tree." (Marg. and Ref.) The rod of the Son of God, by which he destroys his enemies, would pay no regard to any of the trees in that devoted forest.

V. 11, 12. Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, 6, 7 14. 19—22. vi. 11.

V. 13. These events would be a grievous trial of the faith and patience of God's people; or rather, a trial of the Jews and their rulers, whether they would repent or not. And if the sword despised even the rod or sceptre in the hands of Zedekiah, what would be the event? Truly that sceptre would fall from his hands, the temporal kingdom in David's family would cease, and Jerusalem would be desolated. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Note, 9, 10.)—"Ezekiel, moved with compassion, thus complaineth, fearing the destruction of the kingdom, which God had confirmed to David and his posterity by promise; which "promise God performed, although here it seemed to "man's eye, that it should utterly perish." (Note, 25—27. v. 27.)

V. 14. Marg. and Marg. Ref. g.—Notes, 17. Num. xxiv. 10, 11.—Be doubled, &c.] This is by some interpreted to signify, that the third invasion of Nebuchadnezzar would complete the ruin of Jerusalem. He had taken Jehoiakim captive, and then Jeconiah, and at the third time he would take Zedekiah, and lay the city in ruins and desolate the land. But perhaps it only refers to the repeated prophecies concerning the sword which was coming on the land. "Let the stroke be repeated twice and thrice, "that is oftentimes. ..., (Job xxxiii. 29.)" Lowth. (Marg. Ref. h.) This sword would especially enter into the chambers of the great men, where they concealed their idolatries and iniquities; as they were the ringleaders in rebellion, and would by no means escape. V. 19—22. The prophet was here ordered still more plainly to declare, that “the sword of the king of Babylon” was intended by all these metaphors. He must describe on a tile, a parchment, or the ground, the road from Babylon to a place, where it was parted into two roads, one leading to Jerusalem, the other to Rabbath the capital city of the Ammonites. (Marg. Ref. r.—Notes, 19—32. xxv. 2—7. Jer. xlix. 1—5. Am. i. 13—15.)—As the people of Judah confided in the fortifications of Jerusalem, and were about to retire within them; so they were called “Judah in Jerusalem the defenced.” (Marg. Ref. s, t.)—This plan would represent the conduct of Nebuchadnezzar. For that prince would march his army from Babylon, intending to destroy both Rabbath and Jerusalem, but undetermined which he should first attack; so that when he came to the parting of the roads, neither his policy nor his resentment decided his measures, but he had recourse to divination. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. u. —Note, Is. xlvii. 12—15.) This was an appeal to some superior power to determine for him; conducted with many superstitious and idolatrous rites. Three kinds of augury or divination seem to have been used on this occasion. ‘They wrote on several arrows the names of the cities they intended to assault; and then, putting them all together promiscuously in a quiver, they drew them out thence as lots are drawn; and that city whose name was writ on the arrow first drawn, was the city they first made war upon.’ Jerom in Lowth. ‘He mingled his arrows.’ Vulgate.—The teraphim, or little images, that were carried with them, were consulted as oracles; some artificial answer was supposed to be returned by them: (Marg. and Ref. Judg. xvii. 5.—Notes, Gen. xxxi. 19. Hos iii. 4, 5, v. 4:) and, having offered sacrifices, the priests or augurs examined the intestines, especially the liver from the state of which, in different animals, whether mutilated or complete, sound or unsound, or from its colour they grounded their decisions, according to signs and marks laid down among them. The Lord, however, so overruled it, that all these enquiries concurred in determining Nebuchadnezzar to march against Jerusalem, rather than Rabbath. And when this was settled, he appointed captains, and prepared every thing for the siege of that city (Marg. and Marg. Ref. v, x.)

V. 23. The Jews would treat these predictions as false and disregard all the hostile preparations of the Chaldeans as if they were no more to be feared than their delusive divinations. They especially, who had sworn allegiance to Nebuchadnezzar, (along with Zedekiah,) and had broke their oaths, and sworn others to the king of Egypt, would be so infatuated as to despise all warnings. Thus they would be delivered into the hands of Nebuchadnezzar, who would remember against them their perfidy and perjury and avenge himself on them for it. (*Marg. and Marg. 32 Thou shalt be ^x for fuel to the fire; ^y thy blood shall be in the midst of the land; ^z thou shalt be no more remembered: ^a for I the LORD have spoken it.

V. 24. The notorious sins of the Jews of that generation, which shewed that all their doings were contaminated by impiety and iniquity, had caused the sins of their fathers also to be remembered against them, and rendered it requisite for the glory of God, that they should be delivered into the hands of their enemies.—‘Because your sins cry to heaven for vengeance, ye shall fall into the hands and power of the king of Babylon.’ Lowth. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 25—27. The Lord, by his prophet, next addressed himself immediately to Zedekiah, as the head of the conspiracy against his authority. He had shewn his impiety and iniquity, especially in violating his solemn oath, and revolting from the king of Babylon. (See on Note, 23.) But the day was come, when his crimes would meet with condign punishment; and his iniquity and that of his people, would be terminated by their ruin. (Marg. Ref. e—g. —Notes, vii. 5—11. xii. 8—15.) The Lord had given commandment to divest him of the insignia of royal authority, and to reduce him to the condition of a blind wretched captive: when he would not appear “the same” person that he had been; or the authority would not be in “the same” hands. Jeconiah, who was then low in a prison, would again be exalted, and his family would prosper: Zedekiah, who was then on the throne, would be abased; and the Lord would overturn repeatedly the family of David and the government of Judah, till the coming of the Messiah, whose right the kingdom was, and it should be given to him for ever. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. h.—Notes, 1 Sam. i. 4—8. 2 Kings xxv. 1—7. 27—30. Jer. xxii. 28—30. Hag. ii. 20—23. Luke i. 26—33. Heb. xii. 26—29. Rev. xi. 15—20.)—This may also predict the repeated subversions of the Jewish nation by the Chal-

deans, Macedonians, Romans, and many others, to the present day; which will not come to any happy termination, till they submit to their long rejected Messiah: nay, it seems to predict all the convulsions in states and kingdoms, which shall make way for the establishment of his kingdom throughout the whole earth.—‘When the prophets speak to kings in the name of God, they lay aside those titles and expressions of respect, which are otherwise due to regal dignity. (1 Sam. xiii. 13. 1 Kings xviii. 18. 2 Kings iii. 13, 14.)’ Lowth.

Overturn. (27) ‘After that Zedekiah is deprived of his regal authority, there shall be no more kings of that family, till Christ come.’ Lowth. (Marg. Ref. i.)

V. 28. The Ammonites, being reprieved by Nebuchadnezzar’s decision to besiege Jerusalem, were ready to promise themselves security, and to insult over the Jews. But the prophet was ordered to predict their doom also, which Nebuchadnezzar a few years after executed. (Marg. Ref. —Notes, 9, 10. 19—22.) “Their reproach” may either mean the reproach that awaited them, or their reproach of God’s people. (Notes, xxv. 3—7, v. 6. Zeph. ii. 8—10.)

V. 29—32. The diviners of the Ammonites encouraged them, with vain predictions of victory and triumph, to trample on the Jews when suffering the punishment of their sins. It was not therefore proper, that the sword of vengeance should return into its scabbard, till they too were punished. The Lord would on this account judge and execute vengeance on them in their own land, where the nation first received its existence: for the Ammonites seem to have increased from a family to a nation, in the same country which they then inhabited. He would pour his vengeance on them as water: his wrath would burn against them as fire, made more vehement by being blown:

he would deliver them into the hands of men, who were cruel and bloody like wild beasts, and used their understandings only for destruction. Thus he would destroy them; they would never recover their former dignity; and in process of time they would be entirely forgotten. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, 15—17. xxv. 10, 11. Jer. xlix. 6.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—17.

Dreadful is the case of those against whom God has set himself as an adversary! yet all impenitent sinners are exposed to this dire misery. Even holy places and families, which have long been eminent in religion, will have God against them, if they apostatize or greatly degenerate.—In national judgments, the sword of God often cuts off both the righteous and the wicked; but not one of the righteous will be involved in the condemnation of the wicked, at the day of judgment and in the eternal world. (Note, 2 Pet. ii. 5—9.) He often "endures with much long suffering the vessels of wrath, fitted for destruction:" but when at length he draws his sword, it will return no more, till it has effected all his righteous purposes.—It behoves those, who are employed to denounce the awful wrath of God against sinners, to shew that they "do not desire the woeful day:" and the example of Christ teaches us, that we ought to weep and lament over them whose ruin we foresee and declare. (Note, Luke xix. 41—44.) We should also endeavour to convince them, that we are greatly impressed with the reality, importance, and near approach of those invisible things, of which we speak; and instruct them by our example, as well as by our doctrine.—It scarcely seems necessary to enquire, "wherefore men sigh and mourn" in such a sinful suffering world as this: yet those who now mourn with penitent sorrow, and sympathize in the afflictions of God's people, shall rejoice and be exceedingly glad, when all the hearts of ungodly men shall melt, and when they shall in vain call to the rocks to fall upon them, and cover them from the wrath of their offended Judge. But when his sharp and glittering sword is drawn against guilty nations or individuals; and when vengeance is at the door, does it behove the criminals to make mirth? Would it not be more suitable to them to sigh and mourn, and even to howl and cry? at least to fast and pray, and humble themselves under the mighty hand of God, if so be he will be merciful unto them?—In great national calamities, his sword often disdains all the petty distinctions, on which men pride themselves: the most exalted stations and sacred characters are then blended with the poor and obscure in one common ruin: except that the great are singled out as the principal criminals; and the sword often pursues them, into their secret recesses of wickedness, and their most secure hiding places. Even those who fill thrones, when distinguished by profaneness and iniquity, will be exposed to shame, and their punishments made proportionably conspicuous: if they escape such revolutions, as sometimes hurry monarchs from the throne to the prison; yet death will soon terminate their career, rob them of their diadems and sceptres, and transmit them as criminals to the judgment-seat of God.

V. 18—32.

The most self-sufficient and ungodly, as well as the most sagacious and politick, sometimes find their counsels so perplexed, as to feel the want of a superior direction: and the vain superstitions and divinations of idolaters proclaim, how desirable it is to be directed by the word and Spirit of God. But, whatever apparent chance or choice, whatever augury or divination, determine the measures which men adopt; the Lord secretly leads them to execute his wise designs: and even ambitious conquerors, and cruel tyrants, are the undesigning executioners of deserved punishment on condemned criminals. (Notes, Ps. lxxvi. 10. Prov. xvi. 33. xxi. 30. Is. x. 5—7. Dan. v. 18—24.) Wherever the sword of divine justice turns, it meets with men deserving of its stroke: but it commonly begins at the sanctuary, and first executes vengeance on those who profane it by their hypocrisy and iniquity. These are the last persons, in general, who give credit to the warnings of God's word: their hearts are often hardened by repeatedly violating the most solemn vows and engagements, and attending on sacred ordinances in an impious and infidel manner; and they are left to themselves, till they ripen for vengeance: then their sins are made to appear, and they are brought to condign punishment.—Next to such wicked professors of religion, they will be most severely punished, who insult over their falls and miseries.—What a frivolous advantage is it to a condemned malefactor, to be executed the last of the company! how little reason has he to exult over his fellow-sufferers! yet this is the common conduct of profane men; when they see others punished while they are spared; though the sword will not be sheathed till it have consumed them also.—But in the midst of the most tremendous predictions and denunciations of wrath, we still hear some report of mercy, and of him through whom mercy is exercised to sinful men. All these dispensations are in the hand of the only begotten Son of God: and all wars, convulsions, and revolutions, combine to bring forward the establishment of his kingdom. The Lord will "overturn, overturn, overturn," till that great revolution takes place, when "the kingdoms of the earth shall become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ." This should satisfy all, who love his rightful authority, and are become his loyal subjects: "what he doeth they know not now, but they shall know hereafter." But let us be thankful to be employed as instruments of his mercy; let us use our understandings in devising methods of doing good; and let us stand aloof from those brutish men, who are only skilful to destroy.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXII. V. 2. Jerusalem, instead of a holy city, was become, "a city of blood," filled with murder, and every crime for which men were punishable by death. (Marg. and Ref.—Notes, 3—16. Matt. xxiii, 34—39. Acts vii, 51—53.) The prophet therefore, instead of pleading in her behalf, was summoned to sit in judgment on her: whilst the Lord himself assumed the office of an accuser and a witness, and shewed that she merited the sentence of condemnation denounced against her. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. b, c.—Notes, xx. 4. Mal. iii, 5, 6, v. 5.)

V. 3—5. There is a peculiar emphasis in all these accusations brought against Jerusalem, arising from the consideration, that this was the city which God had chosen for the place of his temple, and favoured with his oracles, ordinances, special presence, and protection, above all the cities upon earth. Yet the inhabitants of this very city were peculiarly guilty of murder and idolatry, the two most atrocious of all crimes. They shed much blood, in sacrificing their children to idols, in persecuting the prophets and servants of God, and in cruelly oppressing the poor; by iniquitous laws and unrighteous decrees; and probably by frequent assassinations, in perpetrating robberies, and in furious quarrels. So that the people seemed in haste to bring forward the time of vengeance—They also made idols, to defile themselves; which was eventually to destroy themselves, as it was sure to provoke the Lord to destroy them. Thus they would speedily arrive at those years of desolation which had been predicted, when they would become the objects of scorn and reproach to the heathen: for even the idolaters, whose gods they worshipped, having tenaciously adhered to the religion of their fathers, would mock them for forsaking JEHOVAH, and insult them under the miseries to which their rebellion had exposed them; so that their infamy would equal their misery. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, 2. 25—28. v. 14—17. Is. i. 10—15, v. 15. Jer. ii. 26—30, 33—37, v. 34. Lam. iv. 13—16. Mic. iii. 8—12. Zeph. iii. 1—4. Rev. xvii. 1—6.)

Thy dishonest gain.] תרצב, “Thy covetousness.” Old Version. Covetousness is almost always connected with some kind or degree of unfair and fraudulent dealing, but this is not so generally considered as direct dishonesty: and the insertion of the epithet may lead some to think, that no eagerness after gain is hateful to God, unless attended by gross injustice: whereas “covetousness” in all cases “is idolatry.” (*Marg. V. 15. (*Marg. V. 16. In thyself.] Or, For thyself. The Lord had been the Portion of his people; and he had allotted Canaan to them for their temporal inheritance. But they had forfeited his favour, and were driven out of the country; they might therefore provide for themselves, and get what inheritance they could among the nations, by whom they were enslaved and carried captive: and thus they should know the Lord, by experiencing the misery of forfeiting his favour, and incurring his indignation. (Marg. Ref.)

and set apart for my residence; but shalt be laid open as common ground to be profaned by infidels,’ Lowth.

V. 18—22. Israel, compared with other nations, had been as the gold and silver compared with the baser metals. But they were now become as the dross, or scum, of silver; the refuse that is consumed in the furnace, or thrown away when the silver is refined. Or they were become as brass, tin, iron, and lead, or a mixture of such metals as are comparatively of small value. These may mean different characters among them, all far beneath what Israelites ought to have been, and at best only equal to the heathen. The Lord intended therefore to gather them into Jerusalem, as metals are cast into the furnace; to make the fire exceedingly hot under them by blowing it; and to leave them there to be melted and proved; that if there were any gold or silver, it might be separated and refined, and that the dross and base metal might be consumed. The wrath of God kindled and blew this fire, which consisted of the judgments inflicted on the Jews by the Chaldeans; by whom Jerusalem was entirely destroyed, and all orders and characters of men were either slain, or reduced to a wretched captivity.—The destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, and the long continued calamities of the Jews since that event, seem also to have been intended by the Spirit of prophecy, though the Chaldean invasion was primarily foretold. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, xx. 45—48. xxiv. 3—11. Is. i. 25—27. Jer. vi. 27—30. Mal. iii. 1—4.)

V. 24. V. 25. The false prophets, who were numerous, conspired together to maintain the authority of their lying predictions, to encourage the people in wickedness, and to oppose with contempt and violence the few who spake the word of God. Perhaps they boasted of their unanimity, as a proof of the truth of their predictions: whereas it was a wicked “conspiracy” against the cause of God and the interests of true religion. They resembled “roaring lions” “ravaging the prey:” they were fierce, cruel, and rapacious, seeking only to enrich themselves, and to be avenged on all who opposed them. They not only deceived the souls of men by false doctrine, but they procured the death of numbers, that they might take the treasure and precious things belonging to them: thus they multiplied the widows in Jerusalem, by the murder of their husbands on one pretence or another; and reduced them to poverty, by seizing their property as forfeited. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 27, 28. xlii. 1—16. 1 Kings xxii. 6. 10, 11. 19—23. Jer. v. 30, 31. vi. 13—15. xxiii. 13—15. xxix. 1. Mic. iii. 8—12. Matt. xxiii. 14.)

V. 26. The whole company of the priests were become like Hophni and Phinehas: they wrested the law of God from its true meaning, that it might seem to sanction their enormities; or they contemptuously broke it for their own ungodly gain. They profaned the temple by their crimes, where the sacrifices and oblations were offered, or used by them in a most unholy manner. They disregarded the distinction between holy and profane, and between clean and unclean, both in respect of times, meats, persons, and actions; making every thing bend to their interest. They connived at the profanation of the sabbaths, and joined in it; and their sacred function was so disgraced by their crimes, that the name of God was greatly profaned by them. (*Marg. and Marg. V. 27, 28. The prophets employed all their ingenuity to varnish over the crimes of the princes, who were like ravaging wolves, and took bribes to shed innocent blood. By these means the prophets shared the dishonest gain with the princes, or availed themselves of their authority to gratify their avarice or revenge. And thus from them robbery and oppression were diffused through the land. (Marg. Ref. e, f.—Notes, 13. 25. xix. 2—9. Ps. lxxxii. 2—4. Is. i. 21—24. x. 1—4. V. 30. Jeremiah, and some few others, endeavoured to bring the people to repentance, and to avert divine judgments by their prayers: but they were greatly despised; their efforts were generally and pertinaciously opposed, and almost entirely unsuccessful; and their prayers were discouraged. There was not one, however, that possessed authority or influence, who made a good use of it. Neither the king nor any of his nobles, neither the high priest nor any of the chief priests, not one of the scribes, the members of the sanhedrim, or the magistrates, nor of those, who possessed credit and influence: none of them all employed their abilities and authority to stop the progress of wickedness, and to bring the principal offenders to justice; or endeavoured by their labours and examples to promote a reformation, or to interpose by their prayers to avert divine judgment. The Lord (speaking after the manner of men,) sought for some Moses, Phinehas, or Samuel, to stand in the gap on this occasion; but, as he found none, the destruction of Jerusalem was inevitable. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, ix. 3, 4. xlii. 5. Ps. xcix. 6. cvi. 19—23. 28—31. Is. lix. 16—19, v. 16. Jer. v. 1, 2.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

How strong must the stream of human depravity be when it can burst through so many powerful obstructions, and inundate even the city of God with such a torrent of horrible wickedness, as is in this chapter described!—We must not excuse, or scruple to expose, the crimes of men, because they live in “holy places,” or occupy sacred functions: for when nominal Christians, or the clergy, become odious by their vices; the glory of God requires, that they should be made a reproach and a mocking even to the heathen: and if they be sheltered from deserved punishment and contempt, religion itself will be disgraced, or the sacred ministry despised; but their infamy and vexation shew, that God will not connive at wickedness in persons of any name or station.—It is happy for mankind, that the power of ungodly men is limited: for they who perpetrate the most injustice and murder, would do still more were it “in their power.” But while they greatly harass and afflict others, they destroy themselves.—The Lord notes the sins of men with all their aggravations: and as he will call them to account for their idolatries, murders, and outrageous cruelties; so he will not overlook the neglect and contempt shewn by children to their parents; the oppression of those of other religions, nations, or complexions; the vexation of orphans and widows; the slanders by which characters and even lives are destroyed; the profanation of his holy sabbaths; the neglect of his ordinances, or hypocrisy in attending on them; the preference given by men to their own traditions and superstitions, above his truths and precepts; their multiplied violations of his holy law, in the gratification of their sensual appetites, and in every species of lewdness; or their bribery, extortion, and greediness of gain, however acquired.—It is very common for sinners secretly to indulge their worldly lusts; and to varnish it over with a zealous profession of religion, and a great attachment to some of its doctrines or observances: and thus they impose on themselves, or on others; and perhaps exclaim against those who warn them of their danger, as precise or over rigorous. But can “their hearts endure, or their hands be strong, in the day that God shall deal with them,” as he has spoken? If in temporal judgments, every heart melts and all hands wax feeble; what will be the case “in the day of wrath, and revelation of the righteous judgment of God!” Will the stout-hearted, at that awful season, be able to harden their hearts under misery, as they now do in impiety? Will they despise the accomplishment, as they now do the revelation, of the wrath of the almighty God? As this must be impossible, let them, ere it be too late, submit to God and seek his mercy and salvation. And let those who find acute pain or lingering disease (comparatively light and momentary afflictions,) very hard to be endured, take warning to “flee from the wrath to come,” lest a far “worse thing come upon them.”

THE word of the LORD came again unto me, saying,

2 Son of man, there were ^a two women, the daughters of one mother: a xvi. 44. Jer. iii. 7—10.

V. 17—31.

When rulers and princes choose to be like ravening wolves, and to shed blood in oppression or persecution; they will be sure to find profane priests and false prophets, to buoy up their confidence and keep them in countenance! There always were men of this stamp, who would violate the law of God, contradict his truths, explain away his precepts, prostitute his ordinances, “see vanity, divine lies,” confound all distinctions between holy and unholy, “daub the wall with untempered mortar;” and even become caterers to the lusts, or instruments of the cruelty and iniquity of wicked rulers, for a share of the spoil, and that they might be permitted to “take the treasure and the precious things.” Thus they destroy both the lives and souls of men, “for filthy lucre’s sake.” By such professed ministers of religion, whose false doctrines are devised to hide the shame of their wicked lives, the church of God becomes “a den of thieves” instead of “a house of prayer;” the gold and silver become dross and base metal; and nations are prepared to be melted, or consumed, by the fire of the divine indignation. And if lighter visitations be not sanctified, and rendered effectual to bring men to “repentance and fruits meet for repentance;” they will prove to be the forerunners of desolating judgments and irreversible destruction.—But let every one, according to his measure of ability and influence, endeavour to “make up the hedge and to stand in the gap,” to stop the progress of iniquity, and to avert the judgments of God from our guilty land. The Lord seeks for such men, and will accept their prayers and efforts; and so long as any are found, especially among our princes, senators, magistrates, and rulers in church or state, we may hope to be still preserved: but when none shall remain of this character, it may be expected, that God will “pour out his indignation upon us, and recompense our ways upon our heads, as he hath spoken.” Let then all who fear his name, unite to promote his truth and righteousness even as zealously as wicked men, of every rank and profession, often conspire and combine their efforts to run them down.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIII. V. 2. The two nations of Israel and Judah, were both descended from one common stock, and at first formed but one people or family. (Notes, xvi. 44—47. Jer. iii. 6—11.)

V. 3. As soon as the family of Jacob was grown up into a people, they were seduced into idolatry, and initiated into those abominations, to which they ever after were so exceedingly prone. (Marg. Ref.—Note, xx. 7—9.)

V. 4. The kingdom of Israel, of which Samaria was the capital city, containing ten tribes, and occupying the larger part of Canaan, was called “the elder sister” in this parable. (xvi. 46.) “Aholah,” the name given to her, signifies, His or her tent, or tabernacle; (Marg. and Ref.) and implies, that the whole of the religion established in Israel was a human invention, a temple and service of their own, and not of God’s appointment. “Aholibah,” the name given to the younger sister, or to the kingdom of Judah and the city of Jerusalem, signifies, My tent in her; (Marg. and Ref.) and implies that the worship established in Judah was from God, and that his temple was indeed at Jerusalem: for the profanation of it was the grand aggravation of the sins of the Jews. Both these sisters belonged to the Lord: they were solemnly espoused to him at mount Sinai, and bare sons and daughters to him; that is, children of God, true believers were raised up among them: and had they continued faithful to him, the whoredoms of their youth in Egypt would not have been mentioned against them. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5—10. The kingdom of Israel not only revolted from the family of David, but apostatized from God, whose people they were by the most solemn engagements. In addition to their previous gross idolatries, in worshipping the golden calves and Baal; in the latter times of their nation, they connected themselves with the Assyrians, who became their neighbours by conquering the Syrians. They then became dotingly fond of their idols: being captivated by the comely persons and splendid appearance of the Assyrian captains and horsemen; and thinking every thing desirable, which tended to connect them with these new idolatrous allies. Thus they defiled themselves with their idols; and at the same time they retained the idolatries, which they had first learned in Egypt. Wherefore the Lord at length punished them by the kings of Assyria, who turned against them, entirely spoiled their country, and slaughtered, enslaved, impoverished, and dispersed the inhabitants. Thus they executed judgment upon Samaria and Israel, and Aholah became “famous,” or a name, for her crimes and her calamities. The expression means celebrated, whether in an honourable or a dishonourable manner; either famous or infamous.—‘As she had been formerly renowned among the heathen for her beauty; (xvi. 14;) so now she was every where talked of as a remarkable instance of God’s vengeance, and set forth as an example to other cities and nations, to deter them from the like abominations.’ Lowth. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, xvi. 30—43. 2 Kings xv. 19, 20. xvii. 3—6. 24. Jer. iii. 6—11. Hos. v. 13, 14. viii. 9, 10. x. 5, 6. xi. 5—7. xiv. 1—3.)

V. 11—21. All the time that the kingdom of Israel was ripening for judgments, and even after it was ruined, Judah was growing more and more corrupt, and devoted to idols: and in the reign of Ahaz, afterwards in that of Manasseh and Amon, and at last after the death of Josiah, the Jews were more mad upon their idols than even the Israelites had been; so that the efforts of their pious

17 And the † Babylonians came to her into the bed of love, and they defiled her with their whoredom, and she was polluted with them, and her mind was † alienated from them.

18 So she † discovered her whoredoms, and discovered her nakedness: then † my mind was alienated from her, like as my mind was alienated from her sister.

19 Yet she † multiplied her whoredoms, † in calling to remembrance the days of her youth, wherein she had played the harlot in the land of Egypt.

20 For she doted upon her † paramours, whose flesh is as the flesh of asses, and whose issue is like the issue of horses.

22 ¶ Therefore, O Aholibah, thus saith the Lord God; Behold † I will raise up thy lovers against thee, † from whom thy mind is alienated, † and I will bring them against thee on every side.

23 The † Babylonians, and all † the Chaldeans, † Pekod, and Shoa, and Koa, and all † the Assyrians with them: all of them † desirable young men, captains and rulers, great lords and renowned, all of them riding upon horses.

24 And they shall come against thee † with chariots, waggons, and wheels, and with an assembly of people, which shall set against thee buckler, and shield, and helmet round about: and † I will set judgment before them, and they shall judge thee according to their judgments.

25 And † I will set my jealousy against thee, and they shall deal furiously with thee: they shall take away thy nose and thine ears; and thy remnant shall fall by the sword: † they shall take thy sons and thy daughters; and † thy residue shall be devoured by the fire.

26 They shall also † strip thee out of thy clothes, and take away thy † fair jewels.

27 Thus † will I make thy lewdness to cease from thee, † and thy whoredom brought from the land of Egypt:

princes to reform them, only served to discover the inveteracy of the disease, which increased amidst the most powerful remedies used to abate it. They too connected themselves with the Assyrians, and were enamoured of them and their idols; and then with the Chaldeans, and followed their idols: still retaining also their attachment to the Egyptians and their idols. Thus they were like those abandoned women, who have cast off all regard to decency, duty, or consequences; and are given up in the most infatuated manner to their unbridled inordinate passions, and are ready to prostitute themselves to every man they see: and their conduct was represented by these allusions, to shew how loathsome and hateful idolatry is in the sight of God. But after a short time, they were as much alienated from the Chaldeans, as they had been attached to them; (as is frequently the case between bad women and their paramours;) and this made way for their tempters to become their executioners. For, though they were alienated from the Chaldeans, they continued to provoke the Lord by their abominable idolatries and heathen alliances, especially with the Egyptians: so that he was at length entirely alienated from them. (Marg. Ref. q.—Notes, 28. xvii. 15—21. xxi. 23.)

V. 25. Nose, &c.] This refers to the severe vengeance, which enraged jealous husbands sometimes took on their adulterous wives; or to the ignominious and terrible punishment, that was publicly inflicted on them: and it implied that God would employ the Chaldeans to destroy the king, princes, priests, and prophets of Judah; and, as it were, first to mutilate, and then put to death, this infamous adulteress with her whole family. (Marg. Ref.—See on Note, 22—24.—Notes, viii. 6. Ex. xx. 5. xxxiv. 14—17, v. 14.)

V. 27. † These severe judgments shall effectually deter † thee from idolatry and make thee abhor the least approach to it. (xxii. 15.) Lowth. This prediction is frequently repeated; and the accomplishment of it has been most wonderful. It might have been expected, that so that thou shalt not lift up thine eyes unto them, nor remember Egypt any more.

28 For thus saith the Lord God; Behold, I will deliver thee into the hand of them ^z whom thou hatest, into the hand of them from whom thy mind is alienated:

29 And they shall ^a deal with thee hatefully, and shall take away all thy labour, and shall leave thee naked and bare, and ^b the nakedness of thy whoredoms shall be discovered, both thy lewdness and thy whoredoms.

30 I will do these things unto thee, because ^c thou hast gone a whoring after the heathen, and ^d because thou art polluted with their idols.

31 Thou hast ^e walked in the way of thy sister; therefore will I give ^f her cup into thine hand.

32 Thus saith the Lord God; Thou shalt ^g drink of thy sister's cup deep and large: ^h thou shalt be laughed to scorn and had in derision; it containeth much.

a nation ever prone to idolatry, even when residing in a country where the worship of the true God was established, and none else tolerated, would have readily conformed to the idolatrous usages of the nations, among whom they were scattered by the captivity, and so have been incorporated with them. Yet, neither the authority, the frowns, the examples, or the favour, of their conquerors or powerful neighbours, nor their own fears, hopes, interests, or predilection for the sensual, jovial worship of idols, could prevail with them to run into gross idolatry, during the captivity, or afterwards! Nay, they were instrumental to the proselyting of numbers of idolaters to the worship of JEHOVAH, in the countries where they were dispersed! And though, since their national rejection of Christ, the Jews have been as destitute even of the appearance of true religion, as can well be conceived; yet they have in general been preserved from gross idolatry, during almost eighteen hundred years! The fact itself is unparalleled in the history of mankind; but the astonishment of every reflecting person, who carefully compares it with these express predictions must be exceedingly increased by so doing. The princes and nobles of Judah used every artifice, to induce the heathen nations to enter into alliances with them; and bestowed much pains to gain admission with them to their idolatrous worship, as harlots do to inveigle their lovers. And when their ambassadors came before them, besides other methods of making themselves appear alluring or considerable, they took care to be surrounded with luxurious and effeminate retainers, who welcomed the ambassadors of the idolatrous princes with loud acclamations.—‘They sent into other countries, ‘to have such as should teach the service of their idols.’ The “table,” refers to the idolatrous sacrifices, and the feasts connected with them.—The word rendered Sabeans may mean drunkards; (marg.) and it is very probable, that the drunken and mad revels, which the worshippers of Bacchus made in honour of that filthy idol, adorned with chaplets and other decorations, and accompanied with musick, songs, and dances of the most sensual kind, may here be referred to. V. 43, 44. The Lord repeatedly warned Israel and Judah not to enter into alliances with idolaters, nor to join in their idolatries: but though they were grown old in these practices, and had suffered so much by them, that it might have been hoped they would be weary of them; yet they were as eager after them as ever! V. 45. As upright magistrates used to condemn and execute judgment on adulteresses and murderers; so did the prophets in the name of God denounce sentence against Jerusalem and Samaria. Even the heathen princes, who executed the sentence, were more righteous than the apostate sufferers. (Marg. Ref.—See on Note, 37—39.—Note, xvi. 35—43.)

To bear sin, or iniquity, is a noted expression in scripture, signifying the ‘undergoing the punishment due to it (35).’ Lowth.—This observation is of great importance, in respect of our Lord’s sufferings, and the sense in which he “bare our ‘sins in his own body on the tree.” (Notes, Lev. x. 16—18. xvi. 20—22, v. 22. Is. liii. 11, 12. 1 Pet. ii. 18—25. v. 24.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Those who first seduce others into wickedness will have a dreadful account to render: for when the fence of modesty, fear, and conscience are broken down, and habits of sinful indulgence are contracted, it is extremely difficult to reclaim the offenders.—Evil habits, conversation, and connexions so pollute the memory, the imagination, and the affections, and so weaken the authority of reason and conscience over the animal inclinations, and corrupt propensities of our fallen nature; that, even after apparent reformation, the offenders are very prone to relapse into their former practices. Every object tends to bring them to remembrance, associated with the idea of pleasure, and separated from the recollection of the painful consequences; and thus they are again tempted to return to

CHAP. XXIV.

The prophet is informed of the day, when Nebuchadnezzar laid siege to Jerusalem, 1, 2. He is shewn the miseries of the Jews, and the destruction of the city, by the parable of a boiling pot, 3—14. He is forbidden to mourn for the sudden death of his wife; to denote, that the calamities of the people should exceed all expressions of sorrow, 15—24. When tidings were brought him of these events, his mouth would be opened and he should be no more dumb, 25—27.

AGAIN in the ^aninth year, in the tenth month, in the tenth day of the month, the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, them. When sinful imaginations are indulged, and former scenes of vice reviewed with delight; there can be no true repentance or change of heart: for true penitents reflect, with loathing and remorse, on the iniquities of their former years.—Whilst our ears and minds are wounded with the mention of the practices of those, who “work all uncleanness with greediness;” we are not generally aware, that these abominations have in them less turpitude, than our ingratitude to God, and rebellion and enmity against him; except as they partake of that criminality in common with more decent transgressions.—If we would not be polluted with wickedness, we must avert our eyes from it, and close our senses against those objects which excite sinful thoughts and inclinations. So long as men are attracted with personal accomplishments and external embellishments, and with the pomp and pride of life; they will always be tempted to prefer worldly connexions, fashions, and maxims, to the worship and service of God, and the company of his people: and an intercourse with polished, but irreligious nations, always occasions an increase of vanity and iniquity.—That love, which is cemented by concurrence in sin, generally terminates in disgust, contempt, and enmity: and God commonly employs tempters to punish those who listen to them.—When sinners will not take warning by the punishment of others; they will be made warnings themselves, to teach men not to copy their crimes.—Contempt, astonishment, desolation, rage, and despair, will be the portion of the cup of all who forget God, turn their backs on him, and refuse to return: (Note, Ps. xi. 6:) but they, who are his people by profession, and by sacramental vows and engagements, and yet apostatize, will be punished most severely; and especially such as, after having done those abominable things which God hates, venture to go into his sanctuary and profane his ordinances, to compromise for their crimes, or cloke them.—If the grace of God do not change men's hearts, old age will not cure them of the love of sin: nay, the filthiness of the heart often seems to increase with the decays of nature; and worn out debauchees, like rotten wood, become more inflammable when ready to moulder into dust. How dreadful must it be for men to enter the eternal world in such a temper of soul, and with such vile affections!—Unrepented, unmortified, unpardoned sin must end in the destruction of body and soul, in time and to eternity: families, churches, and nations are ruined by it continually; and all righteous men and holy angels, yea, the whole assembled world will applaud the sentence, which at the last day the Judge shall pronounce against the workers of iniquity.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIV. V. 1, 2. The prophet resided many hundred miles from Jerusalem: yet on the very day when the siege of that city was formed, the Lord revealed it to him; and ordered him to make such a memorial of it, as would afterwards give authority to his declaration, that it was in truth the word of God. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, i. 1—3, v. 2. 2 Kings xxv. 1—5, v. 1.)

V. 3—5. To represent to the rebellious Jews the certain event of the siege, the prophet was ordered to speak a parable to them. For the Lord gave repeated orders (as in haste to be obeyed,) to set on a pot and pour water into it. Into this they were directed to gather the pieces of an animal, or of several animals, “the choice of the flock;” especially the choice pieces and bones. This represented Jerusalem besieged by the Chaldeans: all ranks of men were gathered into it, by taking refuge within the walls, especially the nobles and princes; and thus they were retained in the city to their destruction.—‘Add this ... parable: ... though they seem resolved not to take heed to what thou deliverest, either in plain words, or figurative expressions.’ Lowth.—Burn also the bones, &c. (5) ‘The bones of those who have been unjustly slain in the midst of the city, (xi. 7;) whose blood cries for vengeance against it, and kindles God's anger like fire.’ Ibid (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, xi. 1—3. 4—12, v 7. xxii. 18—22. Jer. i. 13, 14.)

8 That ^q it might cause fury to come up to take vengeance: ^r I have set her blood upon the top of a rock, that it should not be covered.

was the pot, and the wickedness committed in it, the scum. The judgments of God upon the Jews caused this scum to arise, by exciting convictions, and discovering their crimes. Under these dispensations they should have put away their transgressions; as the scum, which arises by the heat of the fire, is taken off from the top of the pot. But they grew worse and worse; their sins remained unrepented and unpardoned, and therefore their miseries would continue and increase. All the besieged would endure lingering and dire calamities, till it came to the turn of each to perish, or to fall into the hands of the besiegers: multitudes would die during the siege, by the sword, by famine, and by pestilence: no lot would fall upon them, which should be slain, and which spared; but they would be involved in one common ruin: and all who survived the siege would either be slain, or enslaved by the conquerors, or driven as wretched exiles to wander and perish in other countries. (Marg. Ref. m, n.—Notes, 2 Sam. viii. 2. Nah. iii. 8—11, v. 10.) For the guilt of Jerusalem's murders and other iniquities, remained in the midst of her. Indeed the murderers had avowed their crimes: the blood shed by them was, as it were, set on the top of a rock, a conspicuous place, into which it would not sink, and where it could not be concealed; and they disdained even to cover it with dust, or to bestow the least pains to hide it.—‘The words allude to the command of the law, (Lev. xvii. 13.) that they cover the blood of any beast, or other living creature that was slain, with dust; which was not only intended to prevent their eating of blood, but also to give men a sort of horror or aversion to the sight of bloodshed.’ Lowth. (Note, Lev. xvii. 10—16.) The Lord would therefore call up his hot displeasure, expose their wickedness to all the world, and make their punishment as notorious as their crimes had been. (Marg. Ref. o—r.—Notes, 9—13. 2 Kings xxv. 1—7. Is. xxvi. 20, 21. Jer. vi. 13—15, v. 15.)

V. 9—11. The great pile for fire represented the power, courage, violence, and indignation of the Chaldeans, which would exceedingly distress the Jews, and noth prevent their escape and accelerate their ruin. The command to “heap on wood,” &c. denoted the commission given the besiegers to conduct the assault with increasing vigour, and to treat the Jews with marked seve-

city: so that they would be wasted in the city like flesh in the boiling pot; and all their previous calamities would prepare them for a prey to the Chaldeans, as the meat is stewed and seasoned for relishing food. For they would in this manner glut their revenge, cruelty, and avarice, as if enjoying the pleasures of a feast: and they would pursue the poor remains of the people with unrelenting rage, as men burn the bones, when they have eaten the flesh from off them. But, as the pot was still polluted with the scum, or rust of the metal, (with the relicks of their idolatry and iniquity,) it must also be heated, burned, and even melted by the fire, till wholly purified: that is, Jerusalem would be entirely levelled with the ground, as nothing short of this could purify it from its abominations; and then afterwards it would be rebuilt, free from those defilements, a holy city as in former ages. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 3—8. Is. i. 25—27. xxvii. 7—11. Jer. xxx. 19—22. xxxi. 23—26.)

V. 12, 13. Jerusalem had wearied herself, or wearied God, with lies. At a great expense, and with much labour, she had followed after idols, which were “lying vanities;” she had sought the assistance of her heathen neighbours who deceived her; and she had professed to worship JEHOVAH, when this profession was mere hypocrisy. As no reformation had taken place, the Lord would consume her iniquity by his fiery vengeance. Her idolatry was no occasional offence, the effect of peculiar circumstances of temptation: but it was the result of a violent depraved propensity; an enmity to God and his holy worship; and a strong attachment to the sensual rites and worshippers of abominable idols: as the unfaithfulness of an adulterous wife, is proved to arise from a rooted licentiousness of heart, when she grows more dissolute amidst all means used to reclaim her. The Lord had used various methods to wean the Jews from idolatry, by reforming kings, holy prophets, and awful judgments; but they still continued obstinately attached to idols: they would therefore at length be given up to ruin; and nothing further would be done for their reformation, till the Lord had “caused his fury to rest upon them.” (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 9—11. v. 13. Is. i. 5, 6. v. 3, 4. Jer. iii. 6—11. v. 3—6. xxxi. 18—20. Hos. v. 15. Zeph. iii. 1—4.)

V. 16—18. This was the last message, which the prophet carried to the captives, respecting the destruction of Jerusalem and of the temple; and it was introduced by a very afflictive dispensation to himself. The Lord informed him previously, that he would “take away the desire of his eyes with a stroke;” that is, his wife, whom he greatly loved, and whom we may suppose to have been in every respect worthy of his endeared affection, and a great comfort to him amidst his heavy trials: yet God would take her from him by a sudden stroke, without any intervening sickness, which would aggravate the pain of this sudden and great affliction. Yet he was commanded to avoid every outward expression of sorrow: he was not allowed to shed tears, or to make any outcry, or to use any of the customary tokens of mourning: he was required to wear his turban, or bonnet, and his shoes, as usual; and not to cover his lips, the sign of silent distress. He was not allowed to eat the bread, which was commonly sent on such occasions to the mourners by their friends; as supposing their minds too full of perturbation to make provision for themselves; and perhaps consisting of such things, as were deemed to correspond with their afflicted state, or suited to minister to their comfort. Accordingly, by the grace of God, he was enabled to acquiesce in the divine will, in this trying dispensation: and, after having received this distressing information, he went to speak to the people, and probably to notify to them the affliction which was coming upon him, and the manner in which he was ordered to behave under it. For at even his wife died, and the next morning he openly conformed his conduct to the divine command, though it would probably expose him to the censure of being insensible, and devoid of tender affections. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, 19—24. xlv. 25—27. Lev. x. 3. xxi. 1—5. Jer. xvi. 5—7. 1 Cor. vii. 29—31. 1 Thes. iv. 13—18, v. 13.)

V. 19—24. Some of the people would enquire the prophet’s meaning, in derision or censoriousness; but others would suppose that he thus intended to fix their attention on his instructions: and their enquiry gave him an opportunity of delivering the message of God to them. (Marg. Ref. s.—Notes, xx. 49. xxi. 6, 7. xxxvii. 15—19, v. 19.) He had determined to profane his temple, which had been the chief defence, distinction, and honour of their nation; and which the idolatrous Jews still presumed upon as their safeguard, and gloried in as their pride: nor could they bear to hear or think, that it would ever be destroyed by the heathen. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. t—x.—Notes, 16—18. vii. 20—22. Jer. vii. 3, 4. xxvi. 9.) At the same time, the remainder of their children, the objects of their tenderest affection and compassion, would be slain before their eyes. And then they would imitate the prophet, when he had been bereaved of his most valued earthly comfort: they would not shew any of the ordinary tokens of sorrow, lest they should give umbrage to the haughty victors; or because their troubles came upon them in such quick succession, that they had not space for lamenting each of them; or because their personal sorrows were swallowed up in the calamities of the nation; or the multitudes, who had cause to lament, would render particular instances of afflictions less noticed; or in short their griefs would be too big for utterance. So that, in sullen and stubborn desperation, without even the relief of freely giving vent to their sorrows, they would pine away in unrepented and unpardoned iniquities, or only fretfully complain and repine one to another in private. (Marg. Ref. y—b.—Notes, xxxiii. 10. Lev. xxvi. 38, 39. Am. vi. 9—11.)—Though this was addressed to the captives, yet it related to the general concerns of the nation. For the prophet suffered this heavy affliction in this composed manner, to be a sign unto them of their

V. 25—27. When the city and temple in which they gloried should be destroyed; all the nobles and valiant men, who were the strength, confidence, and rejoicing of the Jews, cut off; and their valuable treasures, and still more valued children, torn from them; the Lord would send one of those, who had escaped the sword, to inform the prophet. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. f—h.—Note, xxxiii. 21, 22.) Then his mouth would be again opened to speak with him that brought the tidings, and to the people concerning the affairs of the nation: and they would be convinced by the event, that he had been a sign unto them, to make them know and fear the Lord. (Marg. Ref. i.—Notes, xxxiii. 24—33. xxxiv. xxxvi—xxxix.) In the mean time he would be dumb, as to the Jews, and would not deliver any prophecies to them, during the continuance of the siege; though employed to deliver several predictions concerning the neighbouring nations. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14.

“The times before appointed,” for the condign punishment of ungodly men, may seem to approach slowly, but they will certainly and speedily arrive. In the mean while it behoves the ministers of God to use every method of exciting the attention, and awakening the consciences, of the careless and obstinate, to a sense of their guilt and danger.—The refuges, to which impenitent rebels flee for safety, are often the occasions or the scenes of their destruction.—Men weary themselves far more in the pursuit of lying vanities, either in open wickedness, or hypocrisy, or superstition, than they need to do, in seeking happiness and salvation in the service of God, and in the method of the gospel.—Some sinners are longer spared than others: but, unless they “repent and be converted,” they will all perish, without respect to rank, abilities, or reputation.—The wrath of God is sufficient to convert any place into a hell, for the torment of his obstinate enemies: even as his favour and consolations can change a dungeon into a heaven, for the benefit of his suffering servants.—Those who are shameless in their crimes, shall be rendered infamous in their punishment: and all the innocent blood, which ambitious warriors, cruel tyrants, oppressors, or persecutors, or false accusers, have gloried in shedding, shall soon be required at their hands.—When the instructions of God’s word, and the chastenings of his rod, leave men hardened in impenitence, he often condemns them “to continue filthy still;” and their filthiness will then ro more be purged, till he has caused his fury to rest upon them to their final destruction. However infidels may despise the denunciations of his word, he will certainly accomplish them, and not go back, nor spare, nor repent; but will judge sinners according to their ways and their doings.

V. 15—27.

“Marriage is honourable in all,” not excepting either priests or prophets, or the most eminent servants of God; and an amiable and pious wife is justly valued and rejoiced in, as one of the chief of created comforts. Yet this honourable and endeared affection must be subordinated to the love of God and submitted to his will. The faith, which influenced Abraham to sacrifice his beloved Isaac, will cause us to submit patiently, should the Lord take away the desire of our eyes by a sudden stroke: for he has a right to recall every loan, and is able to make up every loss to us.—We cannot expect to retain very long our most valued earthly comforts; and should continually be seeking for grace, to enable us properly to bear such separating strokes: yet we may be sure that our sovereign God will not take our relatives from us, without some wise and good reason. But should he see it conducive to his own glory, to our good, or the good of our brethren, to make us examples of suffering affliction and of patience: if our hearts be in a proper frame, we shall say, “Thy will be done;” and shall find “his grace sufficient for us.” Nature must indeed feel exquisitely: but Christians should be careful not to “sorrow as men without hope,” or to copy the vehement language and expressions of grief, which are in use among those “who know not God:” and ministers especially should always endeavour so to moderate their passions on trying occasions, that they may be instructive examples to the numbers, who have their eyes upon them. They must not deviate from their duty to follow the fashions of a vain world: nor is it expedient to omit their work on account of personal troubles; for it has often been observed, that their words on such occasions have proved peculiarly useful to the hearers.—Every dispensation of Providence, and every action of the eminent servants of God, should lead us to enquire what we may learn from them; and it is very desirable, that the conduct of ministers should excite the people to hear the word of God from them.—His ordinances, and the welfare of his church, should be dearer to our hearts than our nearest relatives: for they are “the excellency of the strength,” and the most honourable and joyful distinction of every nation, which truly values them. But when men abuse and pollute divine institutions by their crimes, and yet confide in the outward form, as entitling them to acceptance and protection; the Lord will take away these privileges, or pour contempt upon them. Yet after all the scriptural examples of this truth, men still continue to confide and glory in externals, while they hate the power of godliness!—But if the case of sinners, under great temporal calamities, who remain unhumbled and desperate, and pine away in their iniquities, be very dreadful; what will be the case of those, who are cast into that place, “where their worm dieth not, and their fire is not quenched?” (Note, Mark ix. 43—50.) Blessed be God, we need not thus pine away in any of our present afflictions: for should all comforts fail, and all sorrows combine against us, yet the broken heart and the mourner’s prayer are always accepted before our God. Mourning before him, confessing our sins, and seeking his help and grace; we need not despond, and shall not be left comfortless, in any situation during life, or in the approaching agonies of death.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXV. V. 2. ‘Look thou towards the coast of the Ammonites, and in this posture do thou prophesy against them.’ Bp. Hall. (Marg. Ref. a.—Note, vi. 2, 3.)

V. 3—7. The enmity of the Ammonites, Moabites, and Edomites against the Jews, seems to have originated from ancient competitions, and from covetous desires of their possessions; but it was augmented by their hatred of God and of his worship. (Marg. Ref. b, c.—Notes, Ps. lxxxiii. 1—8.) They therefore rejoiced over the profanation and destruction of the temple, as well as over the miseries of the people and the desolation of the land: and they expressed their insulting triumph in the most indecent manner; as if they meant to encourage the Chaldeans in the work of carnage and destruction. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. i, k.) The Lord therefore reminded them, (for it is probable that these predictions would be sent to them, or heard of by them,) that he was about to deliver them also into the hands of their enemies to be destroyed. (See on Notes, xxi. 28—32.)—It is likely, that Nebuchadnezzar subjugated the Ammonites some time after the destruction of Jerusalem: that the Arabians, and other nations to the east of Judah, took possession of their cities and enjoyed the fruit of their lands: and that they made Rabbah their head-quarters, and there kept their camels and folded their flocks, of which they possessed vast multitudes.—The Ammonites have long since perished from being a distinct nation: and the performance of these predictions was suited to convince the survivors, that JEHOVAH was indeed the only living and true God.—‘By the men of the east must be meant the Chaldeans. (xxi. 19, 20.) Ammon is likewise reckoned among these countries, which God foretold by Jeremiah should be delivered into the hands of the king of Babylon. (Jer. xxv. 21.)’ Lowth. (Marg. Ref. d—h.)

V. 8. Judah had been distinguished from other nations, by the peculiar protection of JEHOVAH, as well as by the temple, and the worship there performed: but their idolatries had rendered them in these respects like the other nations; and their calamities, terminating in the destruction of their city and temple, seemed to indicate, that the Lord either could not or would not protect them any longer. Thus they appeared to be made like to the heathen; and Moab and Edom were greatly rejoiced at it. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 9—11.)

V. 9. ‘I will make a passage for his enemies to invade

11 And *I will execute judgments upon Moab; 'and they shall know that I am the LORD.

12 ¶ Thus saith the Lord God; *Because that Edom hath dealt against the house of Judah, by 'taking vengeance, and hath greatly offended, and revenged himself upon them;

13 Therefore thus saith the Lord God; ^bI will also stretch out mine hand upon Edom, 'and will cut off man and beast from it; and I will make it desolate from ^dTeman; and they 'of Dedan shall fall by the sword.

14 And I will lay my vengeance upon Edom 'by the hand of my people Israel: and they shall do in Edom according to mine anger, and according to my fury; 'and they shall know my vengeance, saith the Lord God.

15 ¶ Thus saith the Lord God;

*Because the Philistines have ^hdealt by revenge, and have taken vengeance with a despiteful heart, 'to destroy it ^gfor the old hatred;

16 Therefore thus saith the Lord God; Behold, ^kI will stretch out mine hand upon the Philistines, and I will cut off the ⁱCherethims, and destroy the remnant of the ^jsea-coasts.

V. 10, 11. "With the sons of Ammon, I have even "given it for a possession to the sons of the east; in order "that the sons of Ammon may no longer be remembered "among the nations. And I will, &c."—The ruin of Moab would deprive the Ammonites of every resource, and be one means of their sinking into neglect and oblivion. Thus both Ammon and Moab, who were nearly related, and generally supported each other, would be desolated together by the same powerful enemies. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Gen. xix. 31—38, vv. 37, 38. Notes, 1 Sam. xi. 1—3. 2 Sam. x. 2—14. xii. 26—31. Is. xi. 11—16, v. 14. xv. xvi. Jer. xlviii. xlix. 1—6. Am. i. 13—15. ii. 1—3. Zeph. ii. 8—10.)

V. 12, 13. The Lord had given the peculiar blessing to Jacob, in preference to Esau; Jacob had grievously offended Esau by his conduct in that matter; and Esau's resentment had been transmitted to his posterity. The Israelites and Jews had also obtained many advantages over the Edomites; who watched their opportunity of taking vengeance for them, when the Jews were in distress, and especially when they were crushed by the power of the Chaldeans: but in so doing they highly offended the God of Israel, and brought his terrible vengeance upon themselves. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xxxv. Gen. xxvii. 36—42. Num. xx. 14—21. xxiv. 17—19. 2 Sam. viii. 12—14. Ps. cxxxvii. 7—9, v. 7. Is. xxxiv. lxiii. 1—6. Jer. xlix. 7—22. Joel iii. 18—21, v. 19. Am. i. 11, 12. Ob. 1—21. Mal. i. 2—5.)

V. 14. Marg. Ref.—By the hand, &c.] Judas Macabæus, and afterwards Hyrcanus, vanquished the Edomites, and at length reduced them entirely into subjection to the Jews: and thus that revengeful nation was made to know the vengeance of God, by the hand of his people Israel.

V. 15. The Philistines were a remnant of the old inhabitants of Canaan; and from the days of Joshua they had hated Israel, and had been for ages very formidable enemies: but, having been at length reduced, they were not able to express their old hatred, till the Jews were subdued by the Chaldeans; and then they assisted them to cut off the fugitives. V. 16. Cherethims, &c.] Either the Cherethims were a tribe of the ancient Canaanites, bordering on the Philistines; or this is merely another name, by which the Philistines were known. "The remnant" seems to mean the inhabitants of Ashdod, which had been almost entirely destroyed. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—2 Sam. xv. 18—22. Zeph. ii. 5—7.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The hatred which ungodly men bear to true religion is so excessive, that they can rejoice in the desolations of the church, and the calamities of her children, even when ruin impends over them from the same quarter!—Though God acts with perfect wisdom and justice, in permitting the profanation of his sanctuary, and the troubles of his professed worshippers, being influenced by abhorrence of their sins, and zeal for his own glory; yet their enemies are induced by far other motives, when they triumph and insult over them in such circumstances.—Those who rejoice at the calamities of their neighbours, out of avarice, ambition, resentment, or malignity, will be exposed to judgments for it: but they who rejoice with great delight in the afflictions of God's people, out of hatred to his truth and worship, may expect that he will stretch forth his hands against them, as his personal enemies. Gladly would such persons see the church entirely destroyed, and made, in character and circumstances, like the rest of the world: but, notwithstanding all her corruptions and afflictions, a vast difference still remains, and will continue to the end of the world, and to all eternity.—When rapacious men are about to seize upon the possessions of others, they often are deprived of their own: and such as disdain the afflicted will soon sink into contempt.—“Vengeance belongeth unto God;” they who without his commission revenge themselves, greatly offend, and will be made to know his vengeance: and those who treasure up the old hatred, and watch for their opportunity of manifesting it, are “treasuring up for themselves wrath against the day of wrath, and the revelation of the righteous judgment of God.”

NOTES.

CHAP. XXVI. V. 1. It is probable, that this was the first day of the first month of that year in which Jerusalem was taken; though the month is not mentioned. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 2 Kings xxv. 1—5.)

V. 2. The Tyrians do not seem to have had any peculiar enmity against the Jewish religion or nation: but they were merchants, whose object it was to extend their commerce; and they supposed, that the ruin of Jerusalem would conduce to their advantage: they hoped to draw to themselves the trade with those people, who had been used to frequent the gates of Jerusalem; and thus to be replenished, when she was laid waste.—‘There was a great confluence of people to Jerusalem from all parts at the solemn feasts, ... as well of Jews as proselytes. ... When Jerusalem was taken, ... the spoil of the city was carried thither’ (to Tyre) ‘for sale: and probably several of the inhabitants, being made captives, were sold there for slaves, a traffick the Tyrians dealt in very much. (xxvii. 13. Joel iii. 4—6.)’ Lowth.—‘Thus the wicked rejoice at their fall, by whom they may have any profit.’ (Marg. Ref.—Note, Joel iii. 3—8.)

V. 3—6. This chapter and the two following contain very copious prophecy against Tyre, which was one of the most ancient cities in the world, and for many ages one of the most flourishing; being the centre of commerce between the east and the west, and the grand emporium of the earth. Such predictions have generally been accomplished in a gradual manner: and whilst some signal and near event was particularly foretold; they contained also expressions, which related to more remote futurity. It had been foretold by Isaiah, that Tyre, after having been destroyed by the Chaldeans, would at length recover her prosperity, and that the Tyrians would be converted to Christianity. (Notes, Isaiah xxiii.) The total and final ruin of that city could not be effected, till those prophecies had been fulfilled: yet that also was clearly predicted, and has accordingly been exactly accomplished. These verses may therefore be interpreted as a summary prediction of those events, which would take place during a long succession of ages: and thus we at this day possess a fuller demonstration, that Ezekiel wrote by divine inspiration, than his contemporaries had; for what man could have thought of so entire a destruction of such a flourishing city, as that which is here predicted, and has accordingly happened?—The Lord, being against Tyre, declared that he would “cause many nations to come up against her.” This may mean the Chaldean army, composed of troops from several nations: but it seems rather to signify the Chaldeans, Macedonians, and other nations, who successively weakened, and at length totally desolated Tyre. These would bear down all before them, like an inundation of the sea; and not only destroy her walls and towers; but even reduce the ground, on which the city stood, to a bare and barren rock, a place for the spreading of nets, like some rocks found in the midst of the seas. The spoil and trade of Tyre would also be divided among many nations; and her daughters, the dependent towns and villages in the adjacent country, would be destroyed by the sword of the conquerors. V. 14. 'It has been commonly said, ... when old Tyre 'was closely besieged, and was near falling into the hands 'of the enemy, that the Tyrians fled from thence, and 'built new Tyre on the island: but the learned Vitringa 'nath proved at large from good authorities, that new 'Tyre was founded several ages before, and was the station 'for ships.' Bp. Newton.—It was, however, the city on the continent which Nebuchadnezzar destroyed; and this was never rebuilt.—'He rased the whole to the ground, and 'slew all found therein. After this it never recovered its 'former glory; ... not rising any higher, than to become a 'village by the name of old Tyre. ... The city on the island 'became the Tyre, afterwards so famous by that name.' Prideaux.—At length Alexander the Great used the ruins of the city on the continent, to make a road or causey across the narrow sea to the city on the island, when he besieged it; and this tended to render the scite of old

Tyre like the top of a rock: and then her stones were literally cast into the "midst of the water" (12). And in process of time the city on the island was also entirely destroyed. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 3—6. 21.)

V. 15. The isles, &c.] The countries of Europe bordering on the Mediterranean, which traded with Tyre, and where her colonies were established, seem here to be principally intended. They were greatly interested in her fate, which must have exceedingly affected their trade and prosperity: probably, they had much wealth in the hands of the Tyrian merchants, and in the warehouses of that city, when it was destroyed; and the fall of so prosperous a city, and the miseries endured by her inhabitants, were sufficient to make all others tremble for themselves, as well as mourn over her. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 16—18, v. 18. xxvii. 26—36. Is. xxiii. 5. 12.)

V. 16—18. The great consternation, excited by the fall of Tyre, is here described in language peculiarly impressive and affecting, (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, xxvii. 26—36, vv. 30—36. Ex. xv. 14—16. Is. xxiii. 4, 6, 7. Rev. xviii. 9—19. P. O.)

Their terror, &c. V. 19. Bring, &c.] The destruction of Tyre is here compared to a shipwreck. (Marg. Ref.—Note, xxvii. 26—

V. 20. Tyre would at length be so entirely destroyed, that her prosperity would no more be remembered, than men are when they have long been dead and buried. (Marg.
Ref.—Notes, xxxii. 17, 18. 21—32. Is. xiv. 12—20.) This would be at the time “when the LORD shall set glory in “the land of the living;” which may either mean, the display of his glory in the exact fulfilment of this prediction, or in the restoration of the Jews to their own land, and in events yet future : or it may refer to the coming of Christ, and the establishment of the gospel.—Some make Tyre a type of Rome, the New Testament Babylon, or antichrist ; at whose destruction the Lord “will set glory “in the land of the living,” by making his cause triumphant all over the earth. (Notes, Rev. xviii—xx.)

V. 21. (Marg and Marg. Ref.—Notes, 3—6. 14.) ‘These ‘prophecies, like most others, were to receive their com‘pletion by degrees. Nebuchadnezzar ... destroyed the old ‘city ; and Alexander employed the ruins ... in making ‘his causey to the island. ... It may be questioned, whe‘ther the new city ever after that arose to that height of ‘power, wealth, and greatness, to which it was elevated in ‘the times of Isaiah and Ezekiel. It received a great blow
‘from Alexander, ... by his building Alexandria in Egypt, ‘which in time deprived it of much of its trade. ... It had ‘the misfortune afterwards of changing its masters often ;
‘being sometimes in the hands of the Ptolemies kings of ‘Egypt, and sometimes of the Seleucidæ kings of Syria ;
‘till at length it fell under the dominion of the Romans.
‘It was taken by the Saracens about the year of Christ

‘year 1289, by the Mamalucks of Egypt : ... from them it ‘was taken in the year 1516 by ... the Turks, and under ‘their dominion it continues at present. But alas ! how

‘is now become a heap of ruins, visited only by the boats ‘of a few poor fishermen.’ Bp. Newton on the Prophecies.
—‘On the north side it has an old Turkish ungarrisoned

‘Babel of broken walls, pillars, vaults, and there being not ‘so much as one entire house left : its present inhabitants ‘are only a few poor wretches, harbouring themselves in ‘the vaults, and subsisting chiefly upon fishing, who seem ‘to be preserved in this place by divine Providence, as a ‘visible argument, how God has fulfilled his word con‘cerning Tyre, viz. that “it should be, as the top of a ‘“rock, a place for fishers to drv their nets on.” Maun- drell’s Journal, quoted by Bp. Newton. The accounts given by late travellers of the present appearance of Tyre, and its inhabitants, differ in some respects from this, and from each other : yet all combine in establishing this conclusion ; viz. that Ezekiel’s prophecy has received a most extraordinary accomplishment : but it is not improbable that future ages may witness a still more literal completion, when the exact place of Tyre shall be no more certainly known, than those of Nineveh and Babylon are at this day.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14.

Many maxims, current in the commercial world, are diametrically opposite to the law of God, which requires us “to love our neighbour as ourselves :” for the selfish love of gain influences men to rejoice in the calamities of others, even of cities and nations, which interfere with this leading object ; especially if they can hope to grow rich when others are impoverished. But God will shew himself to be against such mercenary selfish traders, whose hearts grow callous to every humane feeling, through the love of riches. How then must he abhor those, who increase their wealth by the sweat and blood of their brethren, whom they violently enslave and cruelly oppress for this only reason !—Men have little cause to glory in those precarious advantages, which excite the envy and rapacity of other covetous persons, and are continually shifting from one to another ; and in getting, keeping, and spending of which, they provoke that God, whose wrath “turns joy“ous cities into ruinous heaps.” Thus his justice is displayed and his purposes effected from age to age : and none can say how soon the most powerful and wealthy resorts of commerce, may become, like Tyre, “a place for “the spreading of nets,” and “a spoil to the nations.”
We have abundant cause for gratitude on account of that exemption from war in our land, with which we are favoured ; and to pray that it may be continued to us and our posterity : for the condition of invaded countries, and besieged and plundered cities, is most dreadful. Indeed nothing can reconcile the humane reflecting Christian to the horrors and carnage of war, but the consideration, that the righteous Lord is thus displaying his glory, and making way for the establishment of his kingdom of truth and holiness.

cessive generations, and in the most distant regions; as they will thence deduce still fuller proof of the divine inspiration of that sacred book, which is the sole rule of their conduct and the only foundation of their hopes. Every discovery of a remarkable fulfilment of any scripture-prophecy, is like an evident miracle wrought before their eyes for the confirmation of their faith: and this evidence is continually accumulating upon them, in connexion "with the witness in themselves" which they enjoy in their own experience. Being thus instructed and established in the faith, we should use redoubled diligence, to obtain and possess the full assurance of our citizenship, in that city, which has immovable foundations, unalienable treasures, and joys increasing and eternal, and which no enemies can destroy. (Note, Is. xxxiii. 20—22.) All else is "vanity and vexation:" they, who now terrify others by their power, may soon astonish them by their fall: those, who have now the most established prosperity, will soon be as dead men, out of sight and forgotten: and the wicked will not only go down into the grave, but into the bottomless pit of destruction. But the glory of God, the preservation and prosperity of his church, and the everlasting salvation of his people, will be promoted by the destruction of all who oppose them.

V. 3, 4. Tyre was situated upon the Mediterranean sea, and formed the nearest entrance to it from the interior and eastern part of Asia. It was therefore every way conveniently placed, to unite in commerce Asia, Africa, and Europe. the whole of the known world at that time: especially it was the centre for the trade of Asia and the East Indies, with the many isles and countries of Europe. Old Tyre was built upon the sea-coast on the continent; the new city was upon an island, about half a mile from the shore. In both, the builders had done their utmost to render every thing commodious, elegant, and magnificent, in the greatest degree: so that they seemed to have "perfected their beauty." Of these improvements in architecture, and in every thing connected with the most extensive trade, and the most abundant prosperity, the Tyrians were become exceedingly proud; and they thought their city a perfect model, and superior to all others in the world. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, xxviii. 12—15. Is. xxiii. 2—9.)

V. 5—9. In the subsequent description of the navigation and commerce of Tyre, the criticks and antiquaries have found much employment: but a few brief hints must suffice in this place. The whole is suited to give us the most enlarged idea of the wealth, luxury, and extensive commerce of this renowned city: and to render the prediction of its ruin, and its accomplishment, the more affecting and instructive. The Tyrians, or Phenicians, (for Tyre was the principal city of Phenicia,) were accounted the inventors of navigation; and it is certain, that they carried it to greater perfection than any other of the ancients. We are here informed, that the planks for their shipping, or the decks of their ships, were of fir, brought from Shenir, or mount Hermon: their masts were made of the cedars of Lebanon; their oars (for oars as well as sails were used by the ancients in most, if not all ships,) were of "the oaks of Bashan:" so that the land of Israel supplied the Tyrians with timber for ships, though the Israelites built but few themselves. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. e—g.)—The Tyrians were also furnished with benches of ivory, or inlaid with ivory, by the company of the Ashurites. As ivory was brought out of the interior parts of Asia; and as Chittim signifies the countries adjacent to the Mediterranean sea; it is probable, either that some Europeans imported the ivory, and sold the benches, when made, to the Tyrians, or that artificers came to Tyre to manufacture them. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. h.)—But it does not appear how the Assyrians could be said to make these benches; and the clause is rendered by some, of box-wood inlaid with ivory. (‘בַּחֲשִׁימִים בְּחֵמֶשֶׁת אֵיבֹרִים’ Robertson.)—The fine linen of Egypt, (which was renowned throughout the world,) and richly embroidered too, was used by the Tyrians for their “sails:” or rather for their flags, or colours, as the original may be more properly rendered: and it can scarcely be conceived, that their sails were generally formed of such rich materials; though this extravagance might occasionally be used in an ostentatious display of wealth and magnificence.—Their tents and canopies upon the decks of their galleys, were formed of cloth of blue and purple from the isles of the Egean sea, or the Grecian colonies on the coast of Asia Minor. Purple was called the Tyrian colour: yet the Tyrians were not contented with their own manufactures, but luxuriously used that which was brought from far, and of a great price. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. i, k.)—They had mariners from Zidon, the mother-city, and from Arvad an island in Phenicia; who did the laborious work on board their ships: whilst the Tyrians, being very skilful in navigation, acted only as pilots, or occupied the more honourable departments.—The inhabitants of Gebal, a promontory in Phenicia, having been long skilful and experienced in closing the joinings of the ships to prevent leaks, or in stopping them when made, were retained for this service: whilst ships and mariners, from all nations, came to Tyre to purchase their merchandize, and to dispose of their own for t. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. l—o.)

V. 10, 11. The Tyrians were themselves chiefly employed in navigation and commerce, and in enjoying their affluence: but it was requisite that they should have forces ready to oppose hostile assailants. They had therefore an army of men, hired from Persia, Lydia, and Lybia; whose martial appearance and armour added to the comeliness of the city. The island of Arvad furnished them with soldiers to guard their walls, as well as with mariners (8): and the Gammadims, who perhaps inhabited some part of Phenicia, garrisoned their towers: and their glittering shields, being hung upon the walls, made them have a still more magnificent appearance. The Lydians in Asia seem to have descended from Shem: but Ludim is placed among the sons of Mizraim, the son of Ham: and as Lud and Phut are elsewhere named together, it is probable, that some tribe in Africa is meant; perhaps the Abyssinians. (Marg. Ref. xxx. 5. marg. Gen. x. 13. 22.)—The conjectures of learned men about the Gammadims are altogether unsatisfactory.

V. 12—25. We have here a particular account of the nations or cities that traded with Tyre, and the commodities which they brought to her markets. Thus Tarshish, or Tartessus in Spain, (as it is supposed,) exchanged various metals (which were either the produce of that country, or fetched from others,) for the rich luxuries of the eastern world. It is probable, that the tin was brought from Britain, (out of Cornwall,) which was first known to the ancients, as yielding great quantities of that metal. (Marg. Ref. u.—Notes, 1 Kings x. 22. Is. ii. 10—18, v. 16.)—The different parts of Greece, or the regions about the Euxine and Caspian seas, sold slaves, and vessels of brass, to the Tyrians. Togarmah, or Phrygia, Cappadocia, and other regions in Asia Minor, supplied them with horses and mules, and with servants skilful in managing them. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. x—a.) The inhabitants of Dedan, supposed to be in Arabia, traded with them; and many isles or countries of Europe, traded with the Tyrians for the goods, which they brought them; especially "horns of ivory," or rather, horns, ivory, and ebony, i. e. the horns of some curious animals, ivory which is the teeth of elephants, and ebony, a very hard and valuable wood. These they brought for a present to the Tyrians, or rather as the price of the goods which they purchased.—"Many isles bought the "merchandise of thy hand, &c." (15.) The Syrians bought the manufactures, which the Tyrians made in abundance, and paid for them with precious stones and other articles of luxury. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. b—d.) The land of Judah and Israel had no precious stones or metals to exchange, though it was "the glory of all lands;" but it supplied them with what was more valuable, namely abundance of good wheat, honey, oil, and balm used in medicine. It is uncertain whether Pannag be the name of a place, or of some valued production of Canaan. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. e—h.—Note, Acts xii. 20—23, v. 20.) Damascus changed the wine of Helbon, and white wool, which were both in great repute, for the useful manufactures of Tyre.—The inhabitants of Dan and Javan, (probably not the city Dan in the coasts of Israel, nor any part of Greece as before, but cities in the east,) brought polished iron, or steel, with rich spices to Tyre, to exchange for the commodities of the western world: as another Dedan (probably in Idumea,) did rich cloths to ornament or line their chariots.—Some districts of Arabia supplied Tyre with cattle; others with spices, gold, and precious stones.—The inhabitants of Mesopotamia, Media, and the adjacent regions, traded with Tyre, bringing chests of all kinds of rich apparel. In short, all the ships, which sailed on the sea, and which were generally called "the ships of Tarshish," celebrated the praises of Tyre: that city was replenished with all kinds of riches, and made glorious with all earthly decorations and magnificence. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. i—y.)—Upon a review of these hints concerning the commerce of Tyre, it is plain that that city traded with every part of the then known world, either immediately, or through the medium of other nations.

V. 26—36. Tyre is here poetically described, as a ship at sea, and wrecked, through the mistakes and mismanagement of her pilots and rowers. (Notes, Is. xxxiii. 20—24.) When the rulers of Tyre provoked Nebuchadnezzar to make war upon them, and when they pertinaciously resolved to withstand that haughty conqueror, they rowed this gallant ship into perilous waters; and when the city was taken, it was "broken by the east-wind in the midst of the seas." The same was the case, in the time of Alexander the great, and in those subsequent disasters

34 In the time ^qwhen thou shalt be broken by the seas in the depths of the waters, thy merchandise, and all thy company in the midst of thee shall fall.

35 All ^rthe inhabitants of the isles which terminated in the total ruin of Tyre. Thus the inhabitants and riches of Tyre, like the crew and cargo of a broken ship, sunk into the midst of the seas. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. z—d.—Note, Ps. xlviii. 7.) The cry of the leading men of Tyre, when they saw that the city must be taken, (like that of pilots, when they perceive that the ship must sink,) would be heard in the extreme parts of the city, or even on the adjacent continent. All the rowers and mariners of the ships, who had been accustomed to trade with Tyre, would come on shore to witness the fatal catastrophe, and would express their extreme sorrow by every significant token; and, with great astonishment and deep regret, contrast the former prosperity of Tyre, when kings and nations were enriched by her, with her present condition, now that she was utterly broken and ruined. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. c—t.—Notes, xxvi. 16—18.) But, whilst most kings and nations would be astonished and troubled; some merchants would triumph and insult over her, (as she had done over Jerusalem,) expecting to be replenished, now she was laid waste. (Note, xxvi. 2.) The whole of this is so correspondent with the lamentation, made over the fall of the New Testament Babylon, or Rome, that we cannot but suppose there was something typical in the fall of Tyre. (Notes and P. O. Rev. xviii. 1—19.)—‘The vicissitudes of time, or rather the barbarism of the Greeks of the lower empire, and the Mohammedans, have accomplished this prediction. ...Instead of that ancient commerce, so active and so extensive; Sour, (Tyre,) reduced to a miserable village, has no other trade, than the exportation of a few sacks of corn and raw cotton, nor any merchant but a single Greek factor, ...who scarcely makes sufficient profit to maintain his family.’ Volney. This extract is taken from the writings of one, who published the observations which he made on the spot; and who was very far indeed from favouring the cause of revelation. (Marg.—Note, xxvi. 21.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—25.

While there are persons and books in abundance, ready to instruct us concerning the advantages of extensive commerce, about which the inhabitants of these nations are either ignorant nor indifferent: it would be well, if more regard were paid to those scriptures, which point out the sins and dangers, to which men are exposed by it. We should be thankful for our situation at the entrance of the seas, which renders our land as convenient a centre of modern, as Tyre was of ancient commerce: and we possess singular advantages, as an island, for excluding foreign invaders, as well as for a friendly intercourse with all the nations of the earth. At the same time we should by no means forget the wisdom and goodness of the Creator, in dispensing his liberality, that each country has its valuable productions, which it can spare to other nations: and it would be happy for mankind, if the mutual destruction of wars was more generally exchanged for the reciprocal advantages of commerce, till all nations were united in one common bond of amity and mutual utility. It is also worthy our notice, how many things of small value in themselves, are by manufactures and commerce rendered the means of honest industry and subsistence to hundreds of thousands.—Yet commerce, beneficial as it is, has its peculiar dangers and evils. Alas! that modern commerce, and even that of this favoured land, should have occasioned, perhaps, the shedding of more human blood, than the most destructive wars of sanguinary conquerors! But we hope that God will ere long raise up to us a number of humane and philanthropick legislators, to terminate these hateful abuses; and to establish such regulations, as shall render our commerce conducive to the happiness of the most distant nations, as well as to that of our own: otherwise, whatever profane politicians may imagine, our prosperity will soon be broken, like a ship-wrecked vessel. It is obvious likewise, that commerce tends to increase men’s wants, and inordinate gratifications, and their pride, self-confidence, and vain glory: as if it rendered cities and nations, “perfect in beauty,” sufficient for their own prosperity, and independent on the providence of God. Too often men, eagerly pursuing riches, neglect justice, truth, and humanity; and deem every measure justifiable which proves lucrative, and every thing glorious that is prosperous. Yet more merchants and traders are just, generous, and benevolent, than are humble, pious, and devoted to God. When riches increase, the possessors are apt to set their hearts upon them, and to forget the Lord, who alone “giveth them power to get wealth:” they prefer the wisdom of this world, to that which is from above: they study the ledger more than the bible: extending their trade is a far greater object in their view, than the propagation of the Gospel: religion is made subservient to worldly interest; and the maxims of the counting-house are employed, in bartering for church-livings, and in managing designs, professedly intended for pious and charitable purposes. The beauty of holiness, and the peculiar privileges of the children of God, have no splendour in their eyes, compared with large estates, fair houses elegantly furnished, and all the indulgence of pride and luxury, and of that avarice by which they are supported. And thus the religion, morals, and maxims of nations are corrupted and debauched; the sinews of their strength are relaxed; their policy degenerates into craft, and their counsels into mercenary sophistry.

V. 26—36.

When nations have filled up the measure of their sins, the Lord in anger gives up their rulers to be infatuated; and they engage in rash projects and destructive wars: and thus prosperous states are reduced and ruined; their former grandeur only serves to enhance the greatness of their fall:

many spectators lament and are astonished at their ruin; and others triumph in it, and rise to prosperity, whilst they are no more. 'Trade is a fluctuating thing: it passed 'from Tyre to Alexandria, from Alexandria to Venice, 'from Venice to Antwerp, from Antwerp to Amsterdam 'and London; the English rivalling the Dutch, as the 'French are now rivalling both. ... It behoves those, who 'are in possession of it, to take the greatest care that they 'do not lose it. ... Liberty is a friend to that, as that is a 'friend to liberty. But the greatest enemy to both is licentiousness, which tramples upon all law and lawful authority, encourages riots and tumults, promotes drunkenness 'and debauchery, sticks at nothing to supply its extravagance, practises every art of illicit gain, ruins credit, ruins 'trade, and will in the end ruin liberty itself. Neither 'kingdoms nor commonwealths, neither publick companies nor private persons, can long carry on a beneficial 'flourishing trade without virtue, and what virtue teacheth, 'sobriety, industry, frugality, modesty, honesty, punctuality, humanity, charity, the love of our country, and the 'fear of God. The prophets will inform us, how the Tyrians lost it; and the like causes will always produce the 'like effects.' Bp. Newton.—Whatever may be the case with the community, individuals may guard against these evils in themselves: and their immortal interests call them to it more forcibly, than any temporal motives can do.—If we be poor, we should learn to be contented with food and raiment; and having the needful provisions of Judah and Israel, we need not covet the superfluities of Tyre. Those who engage in commerce should remember, that they are the servants of God; and learn to conduct their business, according to the precepts of his word, in submission to his providence, and with an aim to his glory. And those who possess wealth should remember, that they are his stewards, and must not waste his goods, in gratifying "the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, or the "pride of life;" but should use them in "doing good to "all men, especially to the household of faith," and in promoting the Christian religion. Above all, we should be careful to "seek first the kingdom of God and his "righteousness," and to do and use every thing in subser-

CHAP. XXVIII. V. 2—5. Ethbaal, or Ithobalus, was the prince or king of Tyre, at the time when this prophecy was spoken, and when the city was taken by Nebuchadnezzar. He seems to have been a man of eminent abilities; and under his government the Tyrians for a time prospered exceedingly. But, being lifted up with the most excessive pride, he arrogated divine honours to himself, as many vain-glorious monarchs have done. His sovereignty over the seas was so uncontrouled, and his authority was so firmly established, that he seemed to himself to reign as a god "in the midst of the seas;" and to be placed on the throne of God, rather than on that of a man. Yet was he a poor, frail, mortal man, and not God; though he affected to be absolute, independent, and honoured as a deity. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. a—e.—Notes, 6—15. Ps. lxxxii. 6, 7. Dan. iv. 28—33, vv. 30, 31. Acts xii. 20—23. vv. 22, 23. 2 Thes. ii. 3, 4.)—Daniel, who was not at this time more than thirty-six years of age, being employed in the court of the king of Babylon, had become exceedingly renowned for his wisdom, in all the concerns of government, as well as in interpreting dreams, and resolving difficult questions: but the king of Tyre supposed himself to be wiser than Daniel, and that no secret could be hid from him. (Marg. Ref. g, h.) He was perhaps a man of learning, and understood many abstruse subjects: or he had discovered the secret machinations of his enemies which he ascribed to his superior discernment, and supposed that nothing could elude his penetration. But the chief use which he had made of his wisdom had been to increase his revenues and treasures, by protecting the trade and wealth of his subjects. This he ascribed to his own wise counsels; and thus his riches tended in every way to enhance his pride and self-sufficiency. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. i—l.—Note, Is. xlvii. 7—10.)

V. 6—10. "Thou didst think in thine heart, that thou

8 They ¹¹shall bring thee down to the pit, and thou shalt die the deaths of them that ¹²are slain in the midst of the seas.

9 Wilt thou yet ¹³say before him that slayeth thee, I am God ? but ¹⁴thou shalt be a man, and no god, in the hand of him that ¹⁵slayeth thee.

10 Thou shalt die ¹⁶the deaths of the uncircumcised ¹⁷by the hand of strangers : for I have spoken it, saith the Lord God.

11 ¶ Moreover the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,

12 Son of man, ¹⁸take up a lamentation upon the king of Tyrus, and say unto him, Thus saith the Lord God, ¹⁹Thou sealest up the sum ; ²⁰a full of wisdom, and perfect in beauty.

13 Thou hast been ²¹b in Eden the garden of God ; ²²c every precious stone was thy covering, the ²³d sardius, topaz, and the diamond, the ²⁴e beryl, the onyx, and the jasper, the sapphire, the ²⁵f emerald, and the carbuncle, and gold : ²⁶g the workmanship of thy tabrets, and of thy pipes was prepared in thee, in the day that ²⁷h thou wast created.

14 Thou art ²⁸i the anointed cherub that covereth : ²⁹j and I have set thee so : thou wast ³⁰k upon the holy mountain of God ; thou hast walked up and down in the midst of ³¹l the stones of fire.

15 Thou wast ³²m perfect in thy ways from the day that thou wast created, ³³n till iniquity was found in thee.

“wast equal with God.” Old Version. (John v. 18. Phil. ii. 6.)—This haughty prince was become the rival of “the LORD of Hosts,” and robbed him of his glory ; who therefore resolved to resist and abase him. The Chaldeans were not numbered among the people who traded with the Tyrians, but were “strangers ;” yet God had chosen them to execute his sentence against that city and her king. They were the most “terrible of the nations,” and would oppose their victorious arms to Ithobalus’s self-wise politics. By besieging, and at length taking and destroying Tyre, they would tarnish and defile all his beauty and splendour : and they would bring him down to the grave, without any honour or ceremony ; as those who are slain at sea are thrown overboard. And would he still boast, that “he was God,” when in the hands of the executioners of the Lord’s vengeance on him ? (Marg. and Marg. Ref. m—t. x.) Certainly his death would prove the contrary : and as he would die out of God’s covenant and under his wrath, and the death of the wicked, (which was meant by “the death of the uncircumcised,”) he would perish miserably in every sense. (Marg. Ref. u.)—“Thou shalt come to the same ill end, as befalls the other enemies of God and of his truth.” Lowth.—Hiram, king of Tyre, was the friend of David and Solomon, and probably a pious person : (Notes, 2 Sam. v. 11. 1 Kings v. 1 :) yet his successors had joined the enemies of God, and Ithobalus especially would have his portion among them.

V. 12—15. The prophet was next directed to conclude the prediction against Tyre with a lamentation, or poetical elegy, over this haughty monarch ; which would be the more remarkable, as he was at that time at the height of pride and prosperity. Ithobalus’s opinion of his own dignity, and his ostentation of magnificence, are described in very remarkable language. He vainly thought himself to be the sum of all excellency ; that his abilities, personal accomplishments, authority, and splendour comprised the “fulness of wisdom and the perfection of beauty ;” and that they were his by an unalienable tenure, securely sealed up among his treasures. He thought his dignity as great, and his advantages as many, as those of Adam “in Eden the garden of God.” His crown was formed, and his garments decorated, with abundance of precious stones : of these nine are mentioned, which were set in gold, and were the same as nine of those that were placed in the breast-plate of the high priest, with whom some think he meant to vie in this particular. (Note, Ex. xxviii. 15—29, vv. 17—20.) Tabrets, and other musical instruments, had been prepared for him with exquisite skill : either to celebrate his coronation, the day when he was “created” king ; or his birth, and afterwards his birth-day as it annually returned. Perhaps he had been anointed king, according to the custom in Israel : it was his office to cover or protect his people, and for this purpose God had raised him to his throne : but he forgot his dependence on him, deemed himself able to do it by his own power, and shone in his own eyes, as an angel in heaven, or as a deity.—This refers to the cherubim that covered the mercy-seat, which were anointed with the holy ointment, along with the ark of the covenant, &c. or to those, who guarded the entrance of Eden, and kept every way the tree of life. (Notes, Gen. iii. 22—24. Ex. xxv. 10—21. xxx. 22—33.)—In this conceit of his own excellency, and counting himself equal to the inhabitants of heaven, the holy mountain of God, he walked up and down, surrounded and decorated with precious stones, sparkling like fire. Indeed the affairs of Tyre had been managed by him, with great prudence and success, from the beginning of his reign ; till the detection of his iniquity brought down the wrath of God upon him, and then he was infatuated to his ruin. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.)—The expressions used, in this poetical description of the excessive pride of this monarch, seem to allude to the fall of angels, and to that of Adam in Paradise ; and they intimated that his ruin would be owing to the same cause, and attended with similar effects to him. (Notes,

16 By ^m the multitude of thy merchandise they have ⁿ filled the midst of thee with violence, and thou hast sinned: ^o therefore I will cast thee as profane out of the mountain of God; and I will destroy thee, ^p O covering cherub, from the midst of the stones of fire.

17 Thine ^a heart was lifted up because of thy beauty, ^r thou hast corrupted thy wisdom by reason of thy brightness: ^s I will cast thee to the ground, ^t I will lay thee before kings, that they may behold thee.

18 Thou hast ^u defiled thy sanctuaries by the multitude of thine iniquities, by the iniquity of thy traffick: ^v therefore will I bring forth a fire from the midst of thee; it shall devour thee; and ^y I will bring thee to ashes upon the earth, in the sight of all them that behold thee.

Is. xiv. 3—20.) He is likewise supposed to have been a type of the Roman antichrist, of whom similar things are spoken in the New Testament; and almost the whole of this description may be accommodated to that proud enemy of God and his truth.—But indeed the character, pretensions, and fall, of one man who has been intoxicated with power and pride, so resemble those of others of the same spirit, that it is not always easy to determine, whether the coincidence arises from this circumstance, or whether the one was intended to be a type of the other.

Thou wast perfect, &c. (15) ‘An exact description of the angelical purity in which the devil was created; and in which he continued, till being lifted up with pride, he fell from his first estate.’ Lowth.

V. 16—19. The policy of the king of Tyre had employed such methods of extending its commerce, as led to great violence and oppression, and various transgressions of the divine law. And therefore, though he thought his city and throne sacred, as “the mountain of God,” being consecrated by his own divinity; yet the Lord would cast him out of it, as profane and abominable; he would destroy him from the midst of his ostentatious magnificence, as he had cast down the angels that sinned, from their glorious state in heaven; and he should no longer think himself the protecting deity of Tyre. Seeing “his heart was lifted up” by his endowments and prosperity, and “he had corrupted his wisdom,” by employing it in base projects to increase his magnificence; the Lord would cast him to the ground, and render him a deplorable spectacle, and an instructive warning to other kings, who should behold his fall. He had accounted his palaces to be “sanctuaries,” or temples to his own divinity, in which he sat as in the seat of God: but he had defiled them by his crimes, and the iniquity allowed in his traffick; therefore they would be consumed with a fire kindled by his own folly; and he should perish with them amidst many spectators, for a terror and a warning to them, and should never be restored. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, xxvi. 21. xxvii.)—The infamous traffick of the papal antichrist, in the church of God and about holy things, will certainly expose him to similar or more terrible destruction. (P. O. Rev. xviii. 9—19.)

V. 21—23. Tyre was built by the inhabitants of Zidon, which was the more ancient but the less considerable city, and depended on Tyre. (Marg. Ref. c.—Notes, Gen. xlix. 13. Josh. xix. 24—31. Is. xxiii. 2. 4.) The Lord however was against Zidon also; and he determined to glorify his power, justice, and truth, in executing judgments on her by pestilence and the sword; that his holy name might thereby be known and had in honour. This seems to have been fulfilled by the Chaldeans.—‘Zidon was afterwards utterly destroyed by Ochus, king of Persia.’ Lowth (Marg. Ref. d—h.—Notes, Jer. xlvii. 4. Joel iii. 3—8.)

V. 24—26. These cities bordering on Israel, and peopled in great measure from the ancient inhabitants of Canaan, had been “thorns and briers” to them; had created them much trouble, and treated them with great contempt (Marg. Ref. i.—Notes, Num. xxxiii. 55, 56. Josh. xxiii. 1—13.) But they were about to be finally deprived of their power to molest them. So that when the Lord should restore Israel to their own land, for the glory of his name among the nations; they would dwell in peace and prosperity, being delivered from their enemies, by the just judgments of God upon them.—This was in part fulfilled, after the return of the Jews from captivity: but it is probable, that it will have a far more striking accomplishment, when they shall be converted to Christ, and gathered from their present dispersions. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, xxxiv. 23—31. xxxvi. 20—27. xxxvii. 24—26. xxxix. 23—29.)—The last clause, and many others to the same effect, imply, that they shall know God and his perfec- tions by their own experience.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS

V. 1—10.

Pride is peculiarly the sin of our fallen nature, the essence of our apostasy, and the very poison which Satan’s temptation infused into the hearts of our first parents, and through them into those of all their children. Every pos- session, endowment, or distinction, which the Lord con- fers upon us, serves to excite and give energy to this hateful propensity: and we are disposed to idolize the gifts, or to glory in them as if from ourselves; and to forget the Giver, to become his rivals, and to speak and act, as if we were independent of him, and sufficient to our own safety and happiness. To such a tremendous excess has this disease sometimes arisen, that poor dying worms have fancied themselves deities; have demanded temples, sacrifices, and adoration; have dreamed, that they were able to save or to destroy; and have presumed to arrogate the style, and at- tempted to exercise the peculiar prerogatives, of the most High God! But the mightiest and most accomplished monarch, whose heart is thus lifted up, and intoxicated by dignity and prosperity, may be assured, that God will resist and abase him: and what a wretch will he be proved at last, who, having been honoured and flattered as more than human through life, dies in his sins, and has his eternal portion with the devil and his angels in the bottom- less pit! Then, at least, the delusion will cease, and he will know himself to be a feeble and wretched, because a sinful man. What then is that wisdom, of which so many boast, as if “no secret could be hid from them?” It may perhaps serve to amass riches, and other incentives to their worldly lusts: yet even in this respect both the exercise and the success of it depend on the providence of God. If in these things they were wiser and more pros- perous than Daniel, or than Solomon: yet the most illi- terate and despised believer is far wiser than they, in the most important matters; for “the secret of the LORD is “with them that fear him,” which alone can lead to hap- piness temporal and eternal. Whereas all the wisdom in the world, is in fact insufficient to save men’s bodies from the grave, or their souls from hell: it cannot secure their limbs from pain, or their hearts from anguish: and a fever or a blow may render the wisest man on earth an ideot, or a lunatick, to the end of his days.

V. 11—26.

How vain are all talents, beauty, dignity, or magni- ficence! How little would it avail us if we could seal all worldly accomplishments and distinctions, “among our “treasures!” Nay, were it possible to enter the garden of Eden, and to contemplate its beauties, and feast upon its fruits; or even to enter heaven, that holy mountain of God, and among his angels to behold the glories and hear the harmony of that blessed place; we could enjoy no solid happiness, without a humble, holy, and spiritual mind. Should the brightest Cherub or Seraph there, who has been “perfect since the day in which he was created,” discover the least pride and iniquity, he must be “cast out “as profane,” even as Satan the first offender was. So that all wisdom and prosperity, which elate the heart, or are corrupted in devising or compassing iniquity, will soon prove to be folly and misery: and all the brightness of earthly magnificence, and the vain joys of sensual, ungodly mirth, will shortly be exchanged for “weeping, wailing, “and gnashing of teeth;” except “godly sorrow, which “worketh repentance unto salvation,” intervene.—Spiri- tual pride, however, is of all most diabolical: and when men are puffed up with knowledge, gifts, or eminence in the church of God; when they ambitiously usurp authority, and arrogate to themselves the power over men’s con- sciences, or presume to change the laws of God; when they mistake external pomp for “the beauty of holiness,” and carnal policy for heavenly wisdom, and “gain for “godliness,” and shine as angels in their own esteem: then they peculiarly resemble Satan in heaven, when iniquity was first found in him; and are in danger of similar de- struction to his, when he was cast down to hell. Such men very often defile sacred places and functions by their iniquities, and their infamous traffick about spiritual things: and they may expect to perish by no common destruction, but to be made a warning to others not to copy their sacri- lege, blasphemy, and presumption.—It is exceedingly dif- ficult to possess any distinction, without being proud of it; or to conduct extensive and lucrative trade, without covetousness, oppression, or iniquity: indeed this can be learned no where, except in the school of Christ, and by the teaching of his Spirit.—In short, sin alone can ruin a holy creature: and only he “who taketh away sin,” is able to do real good to fallen man. Happy therefore is the true Christian, though poor, afflicted, and despised; though destitute of shining talents, and exposed to “prickling “thorns and briers,” or terrible persecutions. For, whilst the cup of the Lord’s indignation goes round, and he is glorified in executing judgments on his proud and prosperous enemies: he will display his truth, power, and mercy, in the salvation and everlasting honour and felicity of his redeemed people.—Let others then celebrate the genius and learning of Greece, and the magnificence and riches of Tyre, Babylon, or Rome. Let us celebrate the praises of Zion, the city of our God, of which glorious things are spoken by the Lord himself: let us seek no other honours or distinctions than those, which belong to all her citizens: (Notes and P. O. Ps. lxxxvii:) and whatever else we remain ignorant of, let us seek the humbling, sanctifying knowledge of God, and the enlarged experience of his salvation. Then we shall be enabled to say, “The lines are fallen unto me in a pleasant place: yea, I have a goodly heritage.”

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIX. V. 1. This and the three following chapters contain predictions concerning Egypt, which were delivered at different times. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 2—5. (Notes, Is. xviii. xix, xx.) Pharaoh-hophra, or Apries, king of Egypt, was here represented by a great dragon, or crocodile, lying in the midst of his rivers. (Marg. Ref. f.—Notes, xxxii. 2—6. Ps. lxxiv. 13—17. Is. xxvii. 1. li. 9—11.) The river Nile, and the streams and canals which communicated with it, rendered Egypt peculiarly prosperous and wealthy: and that river abounds with crocodiles; which are very voracious, and domineer over the other inhabitants of the river, as if they were the sole proprietors, and placed there to devour all the rest. Such was Pharaoh-hophra: he was a man of a very haughty, tyrannical, and cruel disposition; and having prospered for several years, he grew exceedingly arrogant; and as Herodotus informs us, he boasted ‘that no god could deprive him of his kingdom.’ This impiety was as absurd, as if the cro-

4 But ^h I will put hooks in thy jaws, and I will cause ⁱ the fish of thy rivers to stick unto thy scales; and I will bring thee up out of the midst of thy rivers, and all the fish of thy rivers shall stick unto thy scales.

5 And ^k I will leave thee thrown into the wilderness, thee and all the fish of thy rivers: thou shalt fall upon the ^{*} open fields; thou shalt not be brought together nor gathered: ^l I have given thee for meat to the beasts of the field, and to the fowls of the heaven.

6 And all the inhabitants of Egypt shall ^m know that I am the LORD, because they have been ⁿ a staff of reed to the house of Israel.

7 When ^o they took hold of thee by thy hand, ^p thou didst break, and rend all their shoulder: and when they leaned upon thee, thou brakest, and madest all their loins to be at a stand.

codile should think that the river was his own, and that he made it for himself. (Marg. Ref. g.—Note, xxviii. 2—5.) But the Lord was able to deal with this unruly monster, who lay fearless in his rivers, and set the universe at defiance: he meant to destroy him and his forces, as if he had dragged the crocodile forth with a hook, and all the fish of the river had stuck to his scales, and they had been all cast together upon a dry and desert place, to be devoured by the wild beasts and the birds of prey. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. h—l.)—Bochart observes, that the word Pharaoh signifies a crocodile, in Arabick.—The Egyptians in process of time, wearied with the tyranny and cruelty of Hophra, revolted from him, and under Amasis they routed and destroyed his army, and all that adhered to him: at length, he too fell into the conqueror’s hands, and was strangled by him; and thus Amasis succeeded to the throne, after Egypt had suffered most dreadful miseries by these intestine dissensions. (Notes, 8—13. Is. xix. 1—17. xx. Jer. xliii. 8—13. xlii. 29, 30. xlii. 13—26.)—I will put hooks, &c. (4) Notes, 2 Kings xix. 27, 28. Job xli. 1—11.

V. 6, 7. The events, fulfilling this and other prophecies, would be suited to convince the Egyptians that the God of Israel was the Lord of the whole earth. They would be thus punished because they had seduced the Israelites into a dependence on them, and then deceived them to their ruin. Both Israel and Judah had very sinfully formed alliances with the Egyptians; and, relying on them, had engaged in wars with the Assyrians and Chaldeans. But Egypt proved to them like “a staff of reed,” which will not bear the weight of those who lean on it; but breaking pierces their hands or arms, and leaves them in pain to stagger or fall. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 2 Kings xviii. 20, 21. Is. xx. 5, 6. xxx. 1—7. xxxi. 1—3. Jer. ii. 33—37, vv. 36, 37. xxxvii. 1—10.)

8 Therefore thus saith the Lord God; Behold, ^aI will bring a sword upon thee, and ^rcut off man and beast out of thee.

9 And ^sthe land of Egypt shall be desolate and waste; and they shall know that I am the LORD; ^tbecause he hath said, The river is mine, and I have made it.

10 Behold, therefore, I am against thee, and against thy rivers, and ^uI will make the land of Egypt ^vutterly waste and desolate, ^wfrom the tower of ^xSyene, even unto the border of Ethiopia.

V. 8-13. The preceding figurative prediction related principally to the king of Egypt; what follows chiefly respected the nation: that foretold the ruin of Hophra and his party by civil wars; this relates to the desolations occasioned by the victorious arms of Nebuchadnezzar, some years after. It is probable, that the people had approved of the proud and imperious language of their king, and so were punished as accomplices in his crime. (Marg. Ref. t.—See on Note, 2-5.)—The Lord caused Nebuchadnezzar to invade Egypt; and gave him such success, that he put a stop to the commerce of the people, and to their intercourse with their neighbours, nay to their agriculture and journeying; and even reduced the country to a desert “from the tower of Syene,” or rather “from Migdol to Syene,” “even to the borders of Ethiopia;” from the entrance into Egypt out of Asia, to Ethiopia; from one end of the land to the other. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. u.—xxx. 6. marg.) History informs us that Nebuchadnezzar conquered Egypt, and carrying multitudes of prisoners thence, dispersed them in different parts of his dominions: and doubtless great numbers perished, or took shelter in other nations, at the same time. But we are not sufficiently informed of the transactions of those ages, to shew the exact fulfilment of this part of the prophecy, as has been done in other instances. It was, however, predicted, that the land would continue desolate, and the inhabitants dispersed, till forty years were expired. The end of this term nearly coincided with that of the ruin of the Babylonish monarchy; and it is probable, that Cyrus permitted the captive Egyptians to return, and re-people their own land, as well as the captive Jews. (Marg. Ref. x-b.—Notes, Jer. xlv. 29, 30. xlv. 26.)—“The calamities that befell the Egyptians are passed over by Herodotus; because the Egyptian priests would not inform him of any thing that tended to the disgrace of their nation.” Scaliger, quoted by Lowth.

V. 14, 15. In a few years after the time that this prophecy was delivered, the Egyptians were reduced by the Chaldeans, and Egypt has been governed by foreigners, and been tributary to other nations, from that time to the present day. It was during many ages one of the most renowned kingdoms in the world: but it had first oppressed, and then seduced and deceived, the people of God; and this sentence was therefore denounced against it. After the ruin of the Babylonish monarchy, it was subdued by the Persians, and though it frequently revolted they always recovered dominion over it. It afterwards fell under the power of the Macedonians; then it became subject to the Romans, and at length a province of that empire. The Saracens next subdued it; then the Mamelucks; and lastly the Turks, to whom it remains in the most abject servitude at this day. Thus for above two thousand years, Egypt has continued “a base” and tributary “kingdom, not able to “exalt itself above the nations,” as formerly; nor have the inhabitants, during all these ages, been permitted to live under princes of their own race. So that, when at any time they have attempted to shake off the yoke, the short space, during which they aimed at independence, was as nothing to this long succession of ages: and even then, they were rather unsuccessfully struggling for liberty than actually enjoying it. This is a most astonishing accomplishment of a most singular prophecy: for who could have conceived, that so renowned and powerful a country should have been thus permanently subjected to foreigners? (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, xvii. 5, 6. 13, 14, v. 14. Gen. ix. 24, 25.)

V. 16. The Egyptians being reduced into subjection, the Jews were never afterwards tempted to place any confidence in them, as they had before done. (See on Note, 6, 7.)—Their confidence in Egypt “brought their iniquity to remembrance:” either it provoked the Lord to call their sins to remembrance, that he might brance, when they shall look after them: ^h but they shall know that I am the Lord God.

punish them; or when the Jews in after ages should look upon the abject state of Egypt, it would cause them to remember, and be ashamed of the sin committed by their ancestors, in depending on that people. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 17—20. Nebuchadnezzar besieged Tyre thirteen years before he took it. During the siege his soldiers had endured great hardship; their heads had been made bald by constantly wearing their helmets, and their shoulders had been peeled by carrying materials to form the works; and the king must have been at incalculable expense in the undertaking: yet when the Tyrians found that their city must fall, they sent away their most valuable effects, either to the city on the island, or to their colonies; or else they destroyed them: so that the plunder of the city was not sufficient to defray the charges of the siege, or to recompense the labours of the army. (Marg. Ref. k.) But the Lord considered Nebuchadnezzar and the Chaldeans as his servants, in executing his predicted vengeance on the Tyrians; and he purposed to give them a suitable recompence. He would therefore employ them in the conquest of Egypt; which, being weakened by civil wars, would be an easy prey, and abundantly enrich them with its spoil. This prophecy was a confirmation of the preceding, which had been delivered almost seventeen years before. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.)

V. 21. This may refer to the increasing influence and authority of Daniel, in the court of Nebuchadnezzar; and the more favourable disposition of that prince to the religion of the Jews, during the latter part of his life: or, to the deliverance of Jeconiah from prison, and the favour shewn him by Evil-merodach, the son of Nebuchadnezzar; which was a token for good to the house of Israel, in that the family of David began again in some measure to prosper. (Note, 2 Kings xxv. 27—30.) But some think that “that day” relates to the termination of the forty years of Egypt’s desolations, when the captivity of the Jews would also cease.—We may suppose, that Ezekiel continued prophesying, when Daniel was in authority, and after Jeconiah’s enlargement, with greater encouragement and effect than before: but this, as connected with the former part of the next chapter, seems to be the latest prophecy of his which has been transmitted to us.—“When thy prophecies are made good by the event, this shall

‘add a new authority to what thou speakest. (xxiv. 27.)’ Lowth. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Wherever we turn our attention, we discover evidences of the pride and folly of the human heart; and of the abhorrence with which God beholds those, who forget their dependence on him, and rob him of the glory due to his name.—Prosperous oppressors are, among the human species, as crocodiles in a river, or sea-monsters in the great waters: and whilst they prey without remorse on their inferiors, they should be regarded as the common enemies of mankind. Yet, they have commonly bewitched the greatest part of those, whom they have enslaved, into a stupid admiration of their power and success, and into a pertinacious adherence to them even to their own ruin!—When princes and their subjects unite in impiety and iniquity, the Lord often renders them reciprocally the occasions and instruments of each other’s punishment. For he is against, and will shew himself above, the most powerful and insolent workers of iniquity; and can easily subdue those who set all others, and even him, at defiance. He fights against those who injure his people, and still more against such as seduce them from their confidence in him and draw them into sin. And though they deserve to be deceived, wounded, and deserted by those in whom they have sinfully confided; yet their tempters and deceivers must expect the severest punishment.—The desolating judgments and the avenging sword, which the Lord has sent forth into all parts of the earth, and the inconceivable miseries and havock that war has made in every age and nation, prove that the world is full of wickedness: and these lamentable scenes not only illustrate the justice of God; but they are the natural effect of man’s pride, revenge, ambition, avarice, and callous selfishness: they prove him to be the child, and to bear the image, of the arch-apostate, “the murderer from the beginning;” and to possess the same nature with the first-born of fallen Adam, who murdered his righteous brother. But it is a relief to the pious and humane mind to discern traces of the superintending providence of God, and of the truth of his word, in reviewing these dark transactions. The history of nations, in their rise, progress, and decline, is the best exposition of antient prophecies: all events, in one way or other, fulfil the scriptures, and turn to the believer “for a testimony;” when he remembers, that “thus it was written and thus it must be.” All things work together for the good of the church; even nations are reduced, to remove from the people of God the occasions of sin, and to promote their holiness: and in the midst of the most tremendous scenes of war and bloodshed, he is bringing forward those glorious times of truth, and righteousness, and peace, which he has promised shall succeed these convulsions. Thus in the deepest scenes of our adversity he sows the seed of our future prosperity.—The Lord “hath raised up for us a Horn of salvation in the house of his servant David;” and he will shortly raise up ministers, and open their mouths to proclaim his gospel throughout the earth. Like a rich and generous master, he will not let any man serve him for nothing: if he employ ambitious or covetous men as his executioners, he will recompence them according to the leading desires of their hearts: and verily every man shall have his reward. Happy then are they, who desire his favour, grace, and image, and seek their happiness in the spiritual blessings of his new covenant: they will delight in his service, and not covet any recompence, except his merciful acceptance; while the riches, honours, and pleasures which they have chosen, are ensured to them for ever and ever.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXX. V. 2, 3. As the day of Egypt’s desolation is here said to be near, and as Nebuchadnezzar did not invade that country till he had taken Tyre: it is probable, that this prophecy was delivered about the same time with that in the close of the former chapter, and several years after those which follow.—The Egyptians were called upon to howl with anguish, in the prospect of these judgments; as they surely would do when they arrived: and to cry “Woe worth the day,” or “Alas the day;” intimating that it would be the most dreadful day which they had ever seen. For it would be the day in which God would execute vengeance on his enemies; and so “a cloudy day,” or one of uncommon terror and distress, especially as clouds and rain were rarely known in Egypt. It would also be “the time of the heathen;” the time of divine judgments on the Gentiles, as there had been a time of his wrath and judgments on the Jews.—God’s judgments on particular places and nations are an earnest of that general judgment, when he shall execute judgment on all the ungodly.’ Lowth. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 4—8. vii. 6—11. xxxii. 7, 8. Joel ii. 1—3. Am. v. 18—20.)

V. 4, 5. As Ethiopia bordered on Egypt, and was in alliance with the Ethiopians, it would share in these extreme calamities; and their forces would be slain among those of Egypt. For “the foundations” of her cities, or those of her government, would be broken down; and all her allies and mercenary troops from different nations, would fall by the sword.—‘The names in the Hebrew are Cush, Phut, and Lud, who are mentioned together as the Egyptian allies, *Jer. xlv. 9. ...Cush properly signifies Ethiopia here, (See xxix. 10,) as being joined with Phut and Lud, which were people of Africa. Phut is rendered Libya by our interpreters here, and in that place in Jeremiah: but Phut and Lubim were a distinct people. ... more filled with cities than any other nation in the world at that time; which would render her desolation in this respect the more extraordinary.

V. 9. The providence of God would take care, that messengers should be sent in ships by sea, or boats up the Nile, to inform the Ethiopians of the ruin of Egypt, and to alarm them with fears of similar calamities; from which they carelessly deemed themselves secure. Perhaps Nebuchadnezzar sent these messengers to summon the Ethiopians to surrender. They would, however, occasion them great distress and terror, similar to the astonishment of the nations, in the day when the Egyptians were destroyed at the Red Sea; (Note, Ex. xv. 14—16;) or to what the Egyptians had just before endured. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xxxii. 9, 10. Is. xviii. 1, 2. xx. 2—5.)

V. 10, 11. Marg. Ref.

V. 12. If the rivers of Egypt had been dried up, that fruitful land must have become a barren desert; and the Lord was about as effectually to destroy all the sources of its power and prosperity: for he would entirely deliver up the land into the possession of wicked and oppressing spoilers, as if he had sold it to them. Such were the Chaldeans, who first conquered, plundered, and enslaved Egypt; and the Persians, Macedonians, Romans, Saracens, Mamalucks, and Turks, who have successively domineered over and oppressed that country, equally deserved this character. These strangers have wasted, and cruelly tyrannized over Egypt, from that time to this present day, according to the word of God by Ezekiel. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, 13. xxix. 14, 15. Is. xix. 4—15.)

V. 13. The Egyptians were not more renowned among the ancients for wisdom and learning, for wealth, power, and prosperity; than for the multitude of their idols, and the stupidity with which they worshipped even various reptiles and vegetables. On these idols they depended for protection: but the Lord determined to destroy them with their worshippers, and the cities in which they were stationed.—This has been remarkably fulfilled; for the ancient idolatry of Egypt gradually declined, or was exchanged for that of other nations, when the country fell under the dominion of foreign lords: and as there has not been for above two thousand years a prince of the land of Egypt; so the Egyptians have long received their religion from their masters, and have been an abject servile race, greatly afraid of offending their cruel oppressors.—The present Egyptians are either Mohammedans; or ignorant superstitious Christians, who seem to have little more than the name of that holy religion. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 12. xxix. 14, 15. Is. xix. 1—3. 16—18. Jer. xliii. 8—13. xlv. 13—26.)

V. 20—26. This prophecy was delivered soon after the Egyptians had come to relieve Jerusalem when besieged by Nebuchadnezzar, but had gone back unto their own land without effecting any thing; and some months before that city was taken: that is, more than sixteen years before the preceding prophecies. (Notes, 2, 3. xxix. 17—20. 2 Kings xxv. 1—5. Jer. xxxvii. 1—10.)—The Lord at that time informed his servant, that he had broken the arm of Pharaoh, and that it never should be set or bound up, to be healed, and made strong to hold a sword any more. When the king of Babylon took from the king of Egypt all his dominions in Asia, one of his arms was broken. (Notes, 2 Kings xxiv. 7. Jer. xlv. 1—12.) This had taken place some time before, in the days of Pharaoh-necho: and the Lord declared, that he should never recover those territories, or any ascendancy in that part of the world; nay, that his other arm, which was now strong, should soon be broken; so that the sword would drop out of that likewise. This took place under his son and successor, when Egypt was so weakened by civil wars, as to be utterly unable to resist the invaders: and when Pharaoh-hophra was vanquished, dethroned, and driven into the fens to hide himself from Amasis and his party. These events made way for Nebuchadnezzar’s conquest of that kingdom. All this time he was acquiring strength and enlarging his dominions: for the Lord “strengthened his arms, and put the sword” of his vengeance into his hand. Thus the Egyptians were vanquished, enslaved, dispersed, and carried captive. In the mean time Hophra, equally obnoxious to both the contending parties, dragged on his life in great terror and misery: and at length, after a fruitless effort to recover his authority, he was taken and strangled by Amasis, who succeeded, as the vassal of Nebuchadnezzar, to the throne of this desolated and ruined country. (Marg Ref.—Notes, xxix. 2—5. 8—13. Jer. xlv. 29, 30. xlv. 26. Dan. xi. 30.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

That power which renders men proud must be abased; and that prosperity and peace, which lead to carelessness and carnal security, will terminate in terror and anguish.—The wrath of God consumes the prosperity and wealth of powerful nations: when the day of his vengeance comes, it desolates populous countries, or covers them with the carcases of the slain; it turns a fruitful land into a barren desert, and flourishing cities into ruinous heaps; it fills all places with terror and misery, and reduces men to the most abject servitude: yet these are only present effects of the divine indignation, and not worthy of our fear, compared with the “wrath to come,” from which Jesus delivers his people.—It is vain to endeavour to bind up the arm which the Lord is pleased to break, or to strengthen those whom he will bring down: “a dark and cloudy day” awaits his enemies; and all who associate with them, or help them, will share their punishment.—All power and success is from the Lord; and men prosper as long as they are employed in executing his righteous purposes. Happy are his willing servants, who so know him, “in Christ reconciling “the world unto himself,” as to fear, love, trust, worship, and obey him. In one way or other, however, all “shall “know the LORD:” and they, who disregard the discoveries which he has made of himself in mercy, will at length know his power, truth, and justice, in the punishment inflicted on them for their sins: whilst they will be for ever excluded from all hope of his favour; and groan and wail, because their wound is incurable.—All earthly prosperity is fluctuating: those who to-day are at the top of the wheel, before to-morrow may be turned to the bottom, and their arrogant presumption changed into abject despair. But the everlasting mercy of our unchangeable God secures the final felicity of all that love his name.

CHAP. XXXI.

The prophet is ordered to shew Pharaoh the prosperity and pride of the king of Assyria; and his dreadful fall, 1—17: and that he would be destroyed in like manner, 18.

^a AND it came to pass ^a in the eleventh year, in the third month, in the first day of the month, that the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,

^b 2 Son of man, ^b speak unto Pharaoh king of Egypt, and ^c to his multitude; ^d Whom art thou like in thy greatness?

^e 3 Behold, ^e the Assyrian was ^f a cedar in Lebanon ^g with fair branches, and with a shadowing shroud, and ^g of an high stature; and his top was among the thick boughs.

^h 4 The ^h waters ⁱ made him great, the deep ^j set him up on high with her rivers running round about his plants, and sent out her ^k little rivers unto all the trees of the field.

5 Therefore ⁱ his height was exalted ⁱ above all the trees of the field, and his boughs were multiplied, and his branches became long because of the multitude of waters, when ^j he shot ^j forth.

6 All ^k the fowls of heaven made ^k their nests in his boughs, and under his branches did all the beasts of the field bring forth their young, and under his shadow dwelt all great nations.

7 Thus was he fair in his greatness in the length of his branches: for his root was by great waters.

8 The ^l cedars in the garden of God could not hide him: the fir-trees were not like his boughs, and the chesnut-trees were not like his branches; ^m nor any tree in the garden of God was like unto him in his beauty.

9 I have ⁿ made him fair by the multitude of his branches; so that ^o all the trees of Eden, that were in the garden of God, ^p envied him.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXI. V. 1. This prophecy was delivered somewhat more than a month before Jerusalem was taken. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 2. The prophet could not personally address Pharaoh, or his numerous attendants, forces, or subjects: but his prophecies would doubtless be made known in Chaldea, and by degrees in other countries; and thus they might come to the ears of the Egyptian king.—Pharaoh was very proud of his power and greatness: and the prophet enquired to whom he supposed himself to be like. (Note, xxix. 2—5.) Doubtless he thought himself, and was celebrated by his flatterers, as equal to the greatest monarchs who had ever lived: but even if this had been the case, it would not have secured the continuance of his prosperity; for the event had shewn, that the most renowned and successful kings and kingdoms might soon be brought to destruction. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3—9. The Assyrian monarchy was one of the most ancient and prosperous, which we read of in history. It seems to have attained its summit of greatness under Shalmaneser and Sennacherib. (Notes, 2 Kings xv. 19, 20. xvii. xviii. xix. 2 Chr. xxviii. 16—18. Is. vii. 17—25. viii. 1—8. x. xxxiii.) But it is not certainly known when and by whom it was destroyed. Probably it was reduced by Nabopolassar, the father of Nebuchadnezzar, and Cyaxares king of Media, some years before Nebuchadnezzar began to reign at Babylon. Nineveh, the capital of that monarchy, which was one of the most extensive cities ever built, was then taken, and from that time began to decay; till it was at length so entirely desolated, that modern travellers are not agreed where it was situated. These events will be more particularly considered upon several passages in the prophecies of Jonah, Nahum, and Zephaniah. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. e—g.—Notes, Gen. x. 8—12, v. 11. Jon. i. 2, 3. iii. 1—4. iv. 9—11. Nah. i. 1. 9—14. ii, iii. Zeph. ii. 13—15.) But here the prophet mentioned the fall of the Assyrian monarchy, as a fact which was well known to have lately taken place.—The Assyrian king had been highly exalted in his kingdom: and his great power, and extensive dominions, with the protection he afforded to his friends, resembled the spreading branches, the thick shade, and the high stature of a very flourishing cedar on mount Lebanon. The fruitful lands of Assyria; the large revenues which the king drew from vast multitudes all over his extensive territories; his extensive commerce, through the river Tigris, with the countries bordering on the Indian ocean; or, in a word, the various sources of his wealth and prosperity, resembled the rivers and streams, which cause the trees planted by them to grow exceedingly. By these means this empire and its head were exalted above all the kingdoms of the earth; their power became more formidable, and their vassals more numerous, than those of any other people: so that cities, provinces, and nations courted their alliance; took shelter under their powerful protection; and increased and prospered under it, as the fowls of the air amidst the boughs, and the beasts of the field under the covert, of the wide spreading, lofty cedar. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. h—k.—Notes, xvii. 22—24. xix. 10—13. Dan. iv. 10—18. 20—26. Matt. xiii. 31, 32.) Thus the monarch became renowned and honourable: and this cedar in Lebanon grew more lofty, than any “cedar in the garden of God,” or in Eden; or any of the kingdoms or independent states,

10 Therefore thus saith the Lord God; Because thou hast lifted up thyself in height, and he hath shot up his top among the thick boughs, ^aand his heart is lifted up in his height;

11 I have therefore ^adelivered him into the hand of ^athe mighty one of the heathen; ^ahe shall surely deal with him: ^aI have driven him out for his wickedness.

12 And ^astrangers, the terrible of the nations, have cut him off, and have left him: ^aupon the mountains, and in all the valleys his branches are fallen, and his boughs are broken by all the rivers of the land; and all the people of the earth are ^agone down from his shadow, and have left him.

13 Upon ^ahis ruin shall all the fowls of the heaven remain, and all the beasts of the field shall be upon his branches:

14 To ^athe end that none of all the trees by the waters exalt themselves for their height, neither shoot up their top among the thick boughs, neither their trees ^astand up in their height, ^aall that drink water: for they are all ^adelivered unto death, to ^athe nether parts of the earth, in the midst of the children of men, with them that go down to the pit.

15 Thus saith the Lord God; in the day when he went down to the grave ^aI caused a mourning: I covered the deep for him, and I restrained the floods thereof, and the great waters were stayed: and I caused Lebanon to ^amourn for him, and all the trees of the field fainted for him.

16 I ^amade the nations to shake at the sound of his fall, ^awhen I cast him down to hell with them that descend into the pit: ^aand all the trees of Eden, the choice and best of Lebanon, all that drink water, ^ashall be comforted in the nether parts of the earth.

which might be compared to fir-trees, and chesnut-trees, or any other stately and beautiful trees. Perhaps the ascendancy acquired by the Assyrian monarchs over the kings of Judah likewise, may be alluded to by the expression, that “no tree in the garden of God was like unto him in his beauty.” However, they were so prospered in the providence of God, that all other kings and princes envied them their great success and renown. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xxviii. 12—15.)

V. 10—13. The allegory and its interpretation are here interwoven. The Assyrian monarch, though already destroyed, was poetically addressed; and probably the whole race of those princes who reigned in succession was intended, as the description so exactly suits the character of Sennacherib. They were ambitious of reducing all other kings and nations to subjection, and of establishing an universal monarchy; and their pride increased in proportion to their power and success. The Lord had therefore delivered the last of that line into the hand of “the mighty one of the heathen,” or the conqueror of the nations, who was able to deal with him; even Nebuchadnezzar, the subverter of the Assyrian monarchy. (See on Note, 3—9.) By him the Lord had driven the king of Assyria from his throne, his palace, his royal city, and his kingdom, for his wickedness. The Chaldeans, a people to whom the nations had hitherto been strangers, (as they were but lately risen into eminence,) but who were most terrible for valour and fierceness, cut down this lofty cedar, and left him to wither and decay. So large was it grown, that its fallen branches covered the mountains and valleys, and its broken boughs were found near all the rivers: that is, the fragments of this very large dismembered empire formed many states and kingdoms.—And when the nations perceived that the Assyrian king could no longer protect them, they renounced their allegiance to him: nay, the very persons, who had courted his friendship, now preyed upon him and insulted over him!—Or, literally, the birds and beasts of prey came to devour the carcasses of the multitudes, who were slain in these conflicts. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xxviii. 6—10, vv. 6, 7. xxxii. 2—6. Is. xviii. 4—6.)

V. 14—17. God had destroyed the Assyrian monarchy, for a warning to all other kings and nations, not to be ambitious of dominion, or proud of pre-eminence, or secure in prosperity; and not to depend on themselves, or forget the great Author of their advantages; for the rivers, whence they drank waters, came originally from that Ocean.—All the monarchs of Assyria, or the last king and all his proud princes; and all those in every age, who had domineered over their neighbours, and despised God, had been “delivered to death;” and their bodies were gone under the earth, amidst the rest of the “children of men,” even like the meanest of them, who without funeral pomp are thrown into the pit: and this was the end of their greatness, to which many of them had been hurried by a violent and premature death:—Indeed, when the Assyrian monarch went down to the grave, the Lord so ordered it, that there was a great mourning for him.—“The deep, that nursed up this fair tree (4); is described as mourning at its downfall: ... as if the floods had stopped their usual course, on purpose to lament his fate. ... The forest of Lebanon and all the stately trees in it, sympathized with his misfortunes; that is, all his confederates and allies.” Lowth. His fall affected many nations and provinces, and vast multitudes of people, who had lived under his government and contributed to his greatness. A stop was put by his death to their enriching commerce, and to all the business connected with the government of so extensive an empire: and all who grew rich by collecting the revenue, or by honourable and lucrative offices, would doubtless lament his fall.—This seems to be meant by the Lord's "covering" the deep, and restraining the floods," as in mourning for him: which denotes a stagnation of that profitable circulation, which there must be in a prosperous empire, betwixt all parts of it and the seat of government.—Especially the Assyrian nobles and people, the Lebanon where this cedar grew, no doubt deplored the loss of that empire which they had so long possessed, and fainted for grief, and for apprehensions of the fatal effects that might follow this catastrophe. The surrounding nations also shook at the sound or report of this revolution, as the fall of a mighty cedar may be heard at a great distance. Yet when the Lord cast him into the grave and the invisible world, those who had formerly envied or rivalled him, and who had grown prosperous by similar resources, till he had reduced and ruined them, would be comforted, and rejoice to see him ruined in like manner. This is represented under the bold figure of those who lay in the grave, or in the state of the dead, congratulating each other, when they saw their destroyer coming to join them in that abject situation. And they also, who confided in his protection and were his support, (his soldiers, captains, and confederates,) had been slain with him, and were with him gone down into the grave and the world of departed spirits. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, xxvi. 15. xxviii. 16—19. xxxii. 17—32. Is. xiv. 3—20. Jer. li. 9. 34—37. Rev. xviii. 9—19.)

V. 18. Pharaoh is here called to look in this glass, and to see what his glory and greatness would speedily come to. Even if he were as honourable and powerful as the Assyrian king, he would soon be slain, and die a miserable death, and perish among those who were strangers and enemies to God. This sentence was irrevocably passed on Pharaoh, and all his multitude. (Marg. Ref.—Notes 2. xxviii. 6—10. xxxii. 19. Jer. ix. 25, 26.)

This is, &c.] 'The judgment, that befell the king of Assyria, ... is an exact representation of the destruction that remains for Pharaoh and his people. The word Is, commonly denotes the same as to signify, or represent, especially in prophecies, parables, and such like figurative descriptions. (xxxiv. 31. xxxvii. 11. Gen. xli. 26. Ex. xii. 11. Matt. xiii. 19. xxvi. 26.) Lowth.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS

V. 1—9.

What competition and striving is there among men, about the precarious, unsatisfactory, and perishing distinctions of this world! But how few are candidates for that "crown of glory which fadeth not away!" Many of the most powerful, prosperous, and renowned, have also been the most abominable of mankind: and whilst millions have been subjected to their will, perhaps they had not one subject more vile in the sight of God than themselves. This consideration may serve to abate our admiration of those gaudy distinctions, which the Lord evidently deems so worthless and perilous; and may teach us to seek more valuable and enduring advantages.—All greatness and success come from God, through whatever channels they are conveyed: but how few properly consider their dependence on him and obligations to him! Generally, prosperity increases pride, presumption, and impiety, in regular proportion. They, who have the most of those things, which are supposed to constitute an earthly paradise, are either envied themselves, or envy others, or both; and this greatly interrupts the little enjoyment which otherwise they might find in them: but the blessings of the heavenly paradise are not liable to such alloy. How much better then is it to be a lowly tree of righteousness, yielding fruit to the glory of God and the good of men, and in the end to be transplanted into the garden of God above, to flourish for ever; than to be a lofty cedar, and at length to be cut down and cast into the fire of hell!

V. 10—18.

Those who possess authority should use it in protecting their subjects: they are advanced in Providence for this purpose; and this lies at the foundation of their right to allegiance, submission, and tribute from them.—We should be thankful for the blessings of civil government, and not envy those who bear the burden of governing; and who, if they abuse their trust, will have a still heavier burden of punishment laid upon them in another world.—The Lord never drives men from their possessions, or bereaves them of their comforts, but when he can shew that their sins deserved it. He has executioners ready, when vengeance is to be taken: but we need not desire to be "the mighty," or "the terrible," of the nations, to be thus employed; seeing it is far more pleasant and profitable to imitate him, "who went about doing good."—They who trust in princes, will soon be driven from their confidences or perish with them: and those who selfishly favour the prosperous, will as selfishly desert or prey upon them, when they are fallen. The higher men soar in power and pride, the more terrible will be their fall: and such conspicuous characters commonly involve great multitudes of friends and dependents in their ruin, and are sincerely lamented by those who are losers by their calamities. Yet some will rejoice to see them reduced to as abject a condition as themselves: but the gratification of envy, revenge, and malignity is a wretched comfort, suited only to the inhabitants of hell.—In the fate of proud, ungodly oppressors of former ages, those who tread in their steps may read their own doom: and the Lord executes such extraordinary judgments, on purpose to warn others from their destructive courses.—It is the end of wicked men, of every age, nation, and condition in life, to go down into the grave.

The wicked man is indeed often seen flourishing like the cedar, and spreading like the green bay-tree: but the pious observer will notice, that he soon passes away, and is not; and when he seeks him, his place can no where be found. NOTES

CHAP. XXXII. V. 1. This was about a year and a half after the destruction of Jerusalem; and at a time, when Pharaoh continued in the undisturbed possession of his power and prosperity. (Marg. Ref.)—It is remarkable, that there should be so many predictions concerning the ruin of this monarch, and the desolations of his kingdom. But Egypt had been the first oppressor of the church, and was to be judged for it; and perhaps that kingdom typified the papal antichrist, and the more dreadful ruin that awaits him. (Gen. xv. 13, 14. Rev. xi. 8.)

V. 2—6. The Egyptian king had resembled a young and fierce lion, in his conduct both towards his subjects and his neighbours: or in allusion to the seas and rivers, with which his kingdom was bounded and intersected, he was a sea-monster, or a crocodile. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. b—d.)—In the height of his prosperity he raised a very great army, and made war upon the Cyrenians; but he was vanquished, and his army cut in pieces: and the Egyptians, suspecting, from his savage temper, that he had led them forth on purpose to be thus destroyed, made an insurrection against him; which he increased by further cruelties and rash measures, until it made way for his ruin. Thus, the voracious dragon or crocodile “went forth with,” or from, “his rivers,” to trouble and foul those of his neighbours: but the Lord spread his net upon him, and used a company of many people to drag him out of his rivers; and he was then cast forth upon the open field, to be devoured by the birds and beasts of prey.—To represent Pharaoh’s great power, and the effects of his fall, it was figuratively stated, that the flesh of this overgrown monster was so immense, that it would cover the mountains and fill the valleys; and that his blood would be sufficient to drench the land even to the mountains, and to fill the rivers; as when the waters were turned into blood in the days of Moses. This denotes, that his ruin would be attended with terrible miseries to the Egyptians, and afford an immense booty to their enemies. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. e—h.)—Notes, xxix. 2—5. xxxi. 10—13. xxxix. 9, 10. Ps. lxxiv. 13—17. Is. xxvii. 1. xxxiv. 3—7. Rev. xiv. 14—20.)

V. 7, 8. Pharaoh thought himself the great luminary of Egypt: but the Lord declared, that he would put him out by dethroning him. Then the whole land would be darkened, as if the sun, moon, planets, and stars were all eclipsed and hidden at once; and the darkness would be as entire, as in the plague that was inflicted in the time of Moses. (Notes, Ex. x. 21—23. Mark xv. 33.) These bold metaphors denote the total subversion of the state; the anarchy and civil wars which ensued; the miseries attending the Chaldean invasion; and the contempt, baseness, and abject slavery, to which that once flourishing kingdom was about to be reduced. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.)—Notes, xxx. 2, 3. Is. xiii. 9, 10. Jer. iv. 19—27. Joel ii. 28—32, v. 31. Matt. xxiv. 29—31. Rev. vi. 12—14.)

V. 9, 10. When the report of the ruin of Egypt people, "when I shall bring thy destruction among the nations, into the countries which thou hast not known.

10 Yea, I will make many people ¹amazed at thee, and their kings shall be horribly afraid for thee, when I shall brandish my sword before them; ^mand they shall tremble at every moment, every man for his own life, in the day of thy fall.

11 For thus saith the LORD GOD; ⁿThe sword of the king of Babylon shall come upon thee.

12 By the swords of the mighty will I cause thy multitude to fall, ^othe terrible of the nations, all of them: and they shall spoil the pomp of Egypt, and all the multitude thereof shall be destroyed.

13 I will ^pdestroy also all the beasts thereof from beside the great waters: ^qneither shall the foot of man trouble them any more, nor the hoofs of beasts trouble them.

14 Then will I make their waters deep, and cause their rivers to run like oil, saith the Lord God.

15 When I shall make the land of Egypt desolate, and the country shall be ^rdesolate of that whereof it was full, when I shall smite all them that dwell therein, ^sthen shall they know that I am the LORD.

16 This is ^tthe lamentation wherewith they shall lament her: the daughters of the nations shall lament her: they shall lament for her, even for Egypt, and for all her multitude, saith the Lord God.

17 ¶ It came to pass also ^u'in the twelfth year, in the fifteenth day of the month, that the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,

18 Son of man, ^vwail for the multitude of Egypt, and ^wcast them down, even her, and the daughters of the famous nations, ^yunto the nether parts of the earth, with them that go down into the pit.

should reach many distant nations, and the exiles, or captives, should relate the particulars of their distresses to those among whom they were dispersed, it would greatly disquiet their hearts; even though they had not been in any way connected with that kingdom: for it would be a most affecting instance of the instability of human affairs, and of God's wrath against the enemies of his people. They would thus see, as it were, the Lord brandishing his sword before their eyes, which would fill them with amazement and terror; and every one of them would tremble continually, lest the next stroke should destroy him in like manner. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, xxvi. 16. xxx. 9. Ex. xv. 14—16. Josh. ii. 8—11.)

V. 11—14. The desolations of Egypt were effected by the king of Babylon: and this was the sword which was hung over the head of Pharaoh, though his fall was immediately wrought by his own subjects. The Chaldeans, by invading Egypt, were about to destroy the multitudes of its inhabitants, and to terminate its splendour and dignity: nay, they would so desolate the land, that the waters of it should no more be frequented, as before, with the foot of man or beast: and the Lord would cause their waters to be deep, and "their rivers to run," smooth and silent, "like oil;" as there would be none to drain them off into canals, or by any means to impede their course, or to disturb them. Some understand this last verse of the adjacent countries.—'When Egypt is made desolate, ... 'then their neighbours will enjoy such quietness, as a 'river does, which smoothly glides along, and never hath

'its stream fouled or disturbed.' Lowth. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xxix. 8—13. xxxiv. 17—22.)

V. 17. Fifteenth, &c.] That is, of the twelfth month, just a fortnight after the preceding prophecy. Perhaps these predictions were delivered, on the sabbath-days, to the assembled captive Jews.

V. 18. Marg. Ref. u, x.—Cast them down.] That is, 'Predict their being cast down.' (Note, xliii. 2—5, v. 3.) "The daughters of the famous nations" mean the cities or colonies, or the helpless and wretched inhabitants, of the nations afterwards enumerated.—The nether, &c.] 'The expressions denote utter destruction, and are parallel 'to those elsewhere used of being brought down to hell, 'to the grave, or into silence. (xxx. 14. Is. xiv. 15.)' Lowth.

V. 19. Egypt had been more renowned for wisdom and prosperity than any other nation: and Pharaoh thought himself superior to all his predecessors in dignity and excellency. But his ruin was determined on, and he was about to fall and perish, among those who were strangers and enemies to God. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xxxi. 2. 18.)—Or the nation may be meant, the total ruin of which was described by the death and burial of an individual.

V. 20. Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Draw, &c.] Let the Chaldeans drag Egypt, and her multitudes, like criminals to execution; or drag out their corpses to be buried disgracefully in a pit.

21 The ^e strong among the mighty shall speak to him out of the midst of hell with them that help him: they are gone down, they lie uncircumcised, slain by the sword.

V. 21. Pharaoh is here poetically represented as entering the state of the dead, whither many mighty warriors and potentates had gone before him; and he is addressed, and welcomed by them to their dreary habitation. The bold imagery of eastern poetry abounds in these descriptions: yet they imply the general belief, that when the body is cast into the grave, the soul enters an invisible state, where it retains its consciousness and capacities.—Here follows a poetical description of the infernal regions, where the ghosts of deceased tyrants, with their subjects, are represented as coming to meet the king of Egypt and his auxiliaries, (xxx. 8,) upon their arrival to the same place. Hell signifies here the state of the dead. Lowth. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xxxi. 14—17. Ps. xvi. 8—11. Is. xiv. 9—20. Luke xvi. 22, 23.)

V. 22, 23. The king of Assyria was ready to meet Pharaoh, when he should be made “free among the dead.” He is represented as surrounded by the graves of multitudes, who had been slain along with him. These were set in the sides of that pit, into which the Assyrian had fallen before it came to Pharaoh’s turn. The subversion of the monarchy and the destruction of the people, as well as the death of the king, was intended by this representation. They had “caused terror in the land of the living;” but being slain and buried, they lay quiet in the pit, and none feared them. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, xxvi. 17—20.)—The Jewish expositors understand the land of Israel, by “the land of the living;” because the way of life and salvation was there known.

V. 24, 25. Nebuchadnezzar is supposed to have conquered the province of Elam, which formed a part of Persia. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Jer. xlix. 34—38.) It is therefore represented, as fallen with the multitude of its inhabitants, into the grave, having been “slain by the sword.” They too had been renowned and terrible; but at length they bare the shame of being defeated and destroyed. A bed, or coffin, was placed for Elam (the nation being represented as a deceased woman,) in the midst of all her multitude: and their king also was placed among those that were slain.

V. 26—28. Meshech and Tubal seem to mean the Scythians and northern nations; (Marg. Ref. q.—Note, xxxviii. 2;) who frequently made inroads into the southern and more fertile countries of Asia, and caused great terror and devastation, but generally perished with as dreadful a slaughter. They too had “caused terror in the land of the living;” yet they would not lie with the mighty, or be numbered with the Assyrian or Egyptian monarchies. But they went down to death, with their weapons of war in their hands, as men who fought desperately and scorned to yield: and they were buried with their swords laid under their heads, as denoting their characters and exploits; whilst their iniquities or depredations had brought their bones to the grave, and perhaps afterwards exposed them to insults from those whom they had injured. Among persons of this description would Pharaoh be broken, and slain, and perish. Some give another sense to the passage. “They shall not lie among those heathen heroes who died a natural death, and are laid in their graves with pomp and magnificence: ... who were carried to their graves in state; and had their achievements, and other ensigns of honour, affixed to their monuments for perpetuating their memory.” Lowth. (*Marg. and Marg. V. 31, 32. When Pharaoh should enter the state of the dead, and see all those kings and nations who had gone before him, he would the more willingly submit to his doom.—This is spoken according to the common sentiments of mankind, who are better satisfied to suffer with a multitude than alone; though it can be no comfort to those who have perished in their sins, to find multitudes as miserable as themselves. In short, they had caused their terror in the land of the living; and the Lord was about to cause his terror to fall upon them. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16.

How weak and helpless, in respect of the Almighty, are the most powerful and terrible of mankind! Whilst they ravage on every side, devour their own species, and trouble the nations of the earth, to gratify their mad ambition, or revenge, or rapacity; he spreads his net over them, entangles them, and disposes of them at his pleasure; and their former greatness only renders them a richer prey, or a more tremendous spectacle, to those around them! Thus “the lamp of the wicked is put out;” the pomp and splendour of kings and kingdoms are totally extinguished; their “sun goeth down at noon;” and their boasted luminaries set to rise no more!—Terror and amazement must needs seize the hearts of those, against whom the Lord brandishes his sword; and they must tremble every moment for their lives and souls.—It is very mortifying to the pride of man, to consider, what numbers, who once “caused terror in the land of the living,” are now gone down to the grave. Those “who made the earth to tremble,” and whose renown and power extended to the most distant regions, are now confined within the narrow limits of the tomb. They, whose counsels and eloquence swayed the determinations of princes and nations, and had as extensive effects on human affairs as the sword of the mighty, now lie silent in the dust! They, whose wisdom, learning, beauty, wit, or politeness, were celebrated by numerous admirers, are now decayed and mingled with their original earth! whilst the unnoticed multitudes, who go down obscurely to the grave, by thousands every hour, are vast beyond conception. All this is the punishment of sin, and the execution of the sentence, “Dust ye are, and to dust shall ye return.”

V. 17—32.

It is inconceivable how large a proportion of the human race has been prematurely hurried into the grave, by the diabolical trade of war. As if destruction were the most honourable and pleasing employment, which “the strong among the mighty” of the earth, could devise for themselves and their numerous retainers! The subject is in every view gloomy and horrid: but if we recollect, that when the body goes down to the dust, the soul enters into an unchangeable state of happiness or misery; that all who die “uncircumcised in heart,” unconverted and unbelieving, go down into the midst of hell, to bear for ever their shame and punishment; and that immense multitudes die in the very heat of their most malignant and diabolical passions, or in the midst of forbidden gratifications, with their unrepented iniquities upon their souls, and unmortified lusts domineering in their hearts; many of them also answerable for the crimes and destruction of their fellow sinners; the view becomes tremendous in the extreme.—Alas! what are men doing! How are they blinded and deceived by Satan! What are those objects, which they thus pursue, through scenes of horror, and seas of blood, and multiplied impieties and iniquities? “Surely man walketh in a vain shadow, and disquieteth himself in vain;” whether he pursue riches, renown, power, or pleasure. Soon must he be torn from all his possessions and gratifications, to join the multitude of the dead; and to “receive the things done in the body, whether they be good or evil:” and it will be a wretched consolation to those who perish in their sins, that vast multitudes have gone, and are going, the same broad road to destruction; since as they were mutual tempters here, so they will be mutual tormenters hereafter. (Note and P. O. Luke xvi. 27—31.) As “the hour cometh when all that are in the graves shall hear the voice of Christ, and shall come forth, they that have done good to the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil to the resurrection of damnation;” we, who have known something of “the terror of the Lord,” would fain persuade men, to hearken to the voice of the great and terrible Judge, now that he speaks to them as a compassionate and merciful Saviour; and to “seek first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness.” Then, “being pardoned, justified, and sanctified, in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God,”

CHAP. XXXIII.

The prophet is instructed in the duties of his office, as the watchman of Israel, 1—9; commanded to state the rule by which God dealt with them, and the equity of his conduct, 10—20; informed of the destruction of Jerusalem; and ordered to expose the vain hopes and crimes of those who remained in the land, 21—29; and shewn the hypocrisy and covetousness of those, who came to hear the word of God from him, 30—33.

AGAIN the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,

2 Son of man, ^a speak to the children of thy people, and say unto them, ^b When I bring the sword upon a land, if the people of the land take a man of their coasts, and ^c set him for their watchman;

3 If when he seeth the sword come upon the land, ^d he blow the trumpet, and warn the people;

4 Then ^e whosoever ^f heareth the sound of the trumpet, and taketh not warning; if the sword come, and take him away, ^g his blood shall be upon his own head.

5 He heard the sound of the trumpet, and took not warning; his blood shall be upon him: ^h but he that taketh warning shall deliver his soul.

6 But if the watchman see the sword come, ⁱ and blow not the trumpet, and the people be not warned; if the sword come, and take any person from among them, ^j he is taken away in his iniquity; but ^k his blood will I require at the watchman's hand.

7 So thou, O son of man, ^l I have set thee a watchman unto the house of Israel; therefore ^m thou shalt hear the word at my mouth, and warn them from me.

8 When I say unto the wicked, ⁿ O wicked man, thou shalt surely die; ^o if thou dost not speak to warn the wicked from his way, ^p that wicked man shall die in his iniquity; but his blood will I require at thine hand.

9 Nevertheless, ^q if thou warn the wicked of his way to turn from it; ^r if he do not turn from his way, he shall die in his iniquity; but ^s thou hast delivered thy soul.

10 ¶ Therefore, O thou son of man, speak unto the house of Israel; Thus ye speak, saying, ^t If our transgressions and our sins be upon us, and we

they need not fear death and the grave. For Jesus has engaged to receive the departing spirits of his people to his glorious presence: their bodies will feel no pain in the silent tomb: and he will at length raise them also, incorruptible and glorious, that they may be for ever with him. Let us then comfort one another in this mournful and dying world with these words; and let us “be stedfast, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, as knowing that our labour is not in vain in the Lord.”

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXIII. V. 2—9. The prophet had before been thus shewn the important responsibility of his prophetic office: but after the most awful part of his predictions were accomplished, he was again reminded of it, and ordered to declare it to the people; that they might be taught to approve his faithfulness, and that he might be warned to persevere in it. (Note, iii. 17—19.)—They were called “the children of his people,” as if God would disown them because of their wickedness. The instruction is the same as before; but the illustrations are more full and explicit. The Lord himself had “sent the sword upon the land;” and the recent transactions in Judah, where very great numbers had been taken away in their sins, notwithstanding all the warnings given them, were suited to render these topicks more affecting.—The repetition of this and similar warnings, after Jerusalem was taken and destroyed, shewed, that they did not refer merely to the circumstances of those times, but were applicable to individuals in every place, especially to such as are favoured with the oracles of God.—“He sheweth that the people ought to have continually governors and teachers, who may have a care over them, and to warn them ever of the dangers which are at hand. ... The wicked shall not escape punishment, though the watchman be negligent: but if the watchman blow the trumpet, and then he will not obey, he shall deserve double punishment.” (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, xviii. 3, 4, 10—13. Is. lvi. 9—12. Acts xviii. 1—6, v. 6. xx. 25—28. Heb. xiii. 17.)

V. 10. “If, according to the prophecies, God have determined to reckon with us for our sins, and to bring judgment upon us, to what purpose shall our conversion be? and how shall we live though we do amend?” Bp. Hall.—“Thus the wicked when they hear God’s judgments for their sins, despair of his mercies, and murmur.”—The impenitent Jews seem to have charged inconsistency and contradiction upon the prophet’s messages: for whilst he warned them to repent, and assured the penitent of forgiveness; he also predicted that the people “would pine away in their transgressions.” (Note, xxiv. 19—24, v. 23.) “Now,” said they, “if this be the case, how should we live? And of what use are your exhortations and promises? You only tantalize us, and there is no sincerity in

^z 12 Therefore, thou son of man, 'say unto the children of thy people, 'The righteousness of the righteous shall not deliver him in the day of his transgression: 'b as for the wickedness of the wicked, he shall not fall thereby, in the day that he turneth from his wickedness; neither shall the righteous be able to live for his righteousness in the day that he sinneth.

^c 13 When I shall say to the righteous, that he shall surely live; 'e if he trust to his own righteousness, and commit iniquity, all his righteousness shall not be remembered; but for his iniquity that he hath committed, 'd he shall die for it. e xviii. 4. 24.

14 Again, when I say unto the wicked, 'Thou shalt surely die; 'f if he turn from his sin, and do 'that which is lawful and right;

15 If the wicked 'g restore the pledge, 'h give again that he had robbed, 'i walk in the statutes of life, without committing iniquity; 'k he shall surely live, he shall not die.

18 When 'n the righteous turneth from his righteousness, and committeth iniquity, he shall even die thereby.

these proposals: our ruin is decreed, and no repentance of our's can prevent it.—But in reality the prediction implied, that God foresaw the people in general would be obstinately impenitent; though some individuals would repent and be pardoned. (Note, Jer. xviii. 7—10.) It also shewed indeed, that the ruin of the city and nation was determined; but it did not relate to the final state of individuals, who would still be dealt with according to the rules before mentioned, and here again repeated. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 11. "Have I any pleasure at all that the wicked 'f should die? saith the Lord God; and not that he should 'g return from his ways, and live?" (Note, xviii. 23.) This had been proposed in the form of a question: but God here confirms it as an immutable truth, by a solemn oath, that he had none; but was much more pleased, that sinners should repent and live. (Note, Heb. vi. 16—20, vv. 16—18.)—The verse may be rendered, "As I live, saith the 'h Lord God, I am not delighted with the death of a sinner; 'i but I am delighted, if the wicked turn from his way and 'j lives." (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xviii. 28—32.)

V. 12, 13. The same truths are here again stated, which have before been considered, but with some variation of expression: (Notes, iii. 20, 21. xviii. 21, 22. 24—27:) especially it is here added, that if the righteous man "trust 'k to his own righteousness," and to the promises of life made to the righteous, and "commit iniquity; all his 'l righteousness" will not profit him. Men, who think themselves righteous, and are so accounted by others, but who are not truly humble and spiritual, will, in one way or other, "trust to their own righteousness." Some will so confide in their own supposed good works, as to neglect or despise the salvation of the gospel: and yet, while they trust to their own righteousness to justify them, the iniquities which they commit will most certainly condemn them. Others think, that as they are clear in their views, bold in their profession of the gospel, zealous for its doctrines, and do much to promote them; it would be unbelief to doubt of their being true Christians, though they indulge some darling sins in secret, or grasp at unlawful advantages, or in one way or other "set their affection on" earthly objects, and are "carnally minded." Thus they count themselves righteous persons, favourites of heaven, and interested in the promises of life: and yet they commit iniquity, and practically fall into the detestable aphorism, "Let us sin on, that grace may abound."—Others, having for a time made a plausible profession of religion, conclude themselves certainly converted; and then venture into sin upon the supposition that God will not damn them for it; and quiet their consciences by abusing the doctrine of final perseverance, and the examples of some believers, of whom it is recorded in scripture, that they fell into the same sins, and yet repented and were saved.—It is doubtless possible for a true believer to be caught in any of these nets: the only question is, whether he will or will not eventually be delivered, though by sharp rebukes and corrections, and thus return to God with weeping and supplication. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Luke xxii. 32—34, v. 32. Heb. x. 35—39. 1 Pet. i. 2—5.)

V. 14—16. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xviii. 5—9. 21—23. 26, 27. Mic. vii. 18—20. Rom. ii. 7—11. 2 Cor. v. 9—12.) The clause "give again that he had robbed," is here added.—'The sin is not forgiven, unless what is taken 'away be restored.' Augustin, quoted by Lowth.—'He 'condemneth all them of hypocrisy, who pretend to forsake 'wickedness, and yet declare not themselves such by their 'fruits; that is, in obeying God's commandments, and by 'a godly life.' (Marg. Ref. h.—Notes, Lev. vi. 2—7. Num. v. 7, 8. Luke iii. 10—14. xix. 1—10, v. 8.)

V. 21, 22. According to the date here given, this escaped Jew did not come to the prophet, with the intelligence of Jerusalem's being smitten, till almost eighteen months after that event: and some learned men have supposed, that there is a mistake in the date, or that it ought to be calculated differently. (Notes, i. 1—3, v. 2. 2 Kings xxv. 1—5, v. 3.) No doubt the prophet had heard of that event long before eighteen months had elapsed: but perhaps he had not received that full and authentick account of it from an eye-witness, which he was taught to expect, before he delivered any further messages from God to his people. (Note, xxiv. 25—27.) For above three years he had been dumb, in this respect at least: (Note, iii. 22—27 :) perhaps he had been able to converse with the Jews, concerning the predictions which he had formerly delivered to them; and perhaps he spake to them, or delivered in writing, the prophecies which he uttered concerning other nations: but he had received no further revelation from God respecting their affairs; in this sense he had been dumb. But now his mouth was opened, and he prophesied to them as aforetime. (Marg. Ref.)—The hand of, &c. (22) 'I felt a sensible impulse of the prophetic spirit. (i. 3.)' Lowth.

V. 24—29. A small remnant continued in the land under Gedaliah, after the desolations of Jerusalem; (Notes, 2 Kings xxv. 22—26. Jer. xl. 4—16. xli—xliii;) and, notwithstanding all their crimes and miseries, they flattered themselves that they were entitled to the inheritance of the whole land. The promise of it had been made to Abraham.

when he had no children; yet his posterity had inherited it: (Notes, Is. li. 1—3. Matt. iii. 7—10. John viii. 30—36, v. 33 :) but the remaining Jews were many; and they supposed themselves on that account more likely to keep possession of it. They, however, overlooked the contrariety of their character to that of Abraham: they forgot that they had forfeited the title by their crimes; and that both former and later prophets had predicted these desolations of the land. Thus they presumptuously expected to prosper in sin, and to be enriched by the ruin of their brethren. (Note, xxvi. 2.) But the Lord sent them a message, which was widely different from their expectations. In defiance of his law, and in conformity to the abominable superstitions of the nations, they ate with the blood, and pertinaciously worshipped idols; they committed murder and made their sword the arbiter of their disputes, violently defending themselves in injustice; they were guilty of adultery and every abomination: and was it fitting, that they should possess the land, from which their brethren had been driven for similar crimes? On the contrary, the Lord solemnly sware by himself, that they should all be destroyed by one or other of his judgments, wherever they took refuge; and that the land should be utterly desolated, and be deprived of all that pomp and strength in which they gloried.—This was fulfilled, after the murder of Gedaliah, when the survivors fled into Egypt, where they miserably perished; and in the total desolation of the whole land. V. 30—33. While the prophet was affectionately seeking the good of his people; they were continually talking of him, or against him, wherever they met together. (Marg.—Notes, Jer. xi. 18—23. xv. 10. xviii. 18. xx. 10—13.) He was their constant topick, and it was their recreation to animadvert on him, or to ridicule him. (Notes, Is. xxviii. 9—15. 21, 22.) But he would perhaps never have known it, had not the Lord seen it good, that he should reprove them in his name for so doing.—They invited each other to “come and hear the word of the “LORD” from the prophet; and they came and sat before him with the same apparent seriousness, as the most pious people could do: they gave him a patient, and apparently an attentive hearing; yea, they professed “much love” to him and his doctrine: but their hearts were possessed by covetousness; their leading affections and desires went forth after riches; they loved their money more than either God or man, the prophet, his word, or their own souls: and therefore they would not part with one gainful sin, for all that he could say; but would rather cavil at it or ridicule it. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. q—t.—Notes, xiv. 1—5. xx. 1—3. Is. ii. 3—5. lviii. 2—4. Matt. xix. 16—22, vv. 16. 22.) Indeed his voice and manner, his graceful elocution, cogent arguments, or apt illustrations, rendered him to them “as a very lovely song of one, that had a “pleasant voice and could play well on an instrument;” in which the sound is commonly more attended to, than the meaning of the words sung: but they did not receive his words as a message from God, with a reverential and obedient faith; as it appeared from their subsequent conduct. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. u.)—But when the preceding prophecies, concerning the total desolations of the land, were accomplished, as they certainly would be; they would know, that he was not merely “a sounding brass, or tinkling cymbal;” but that a prophet of God had been among them, whose words would be verified in the ruin of all that despised or disobeyed them. (Marg. Ref. x, y.—Note, Luke x. 1—12, vv. 9—12.)—“They come to hear thee for their entertainment, not for their edification, as many go to hear famed and eloquent preachers. St. Augustine tells us, that he himself was such an auditor of St. Ambrose, before he was converted. ... ‘I heard him diligently when he discoursed in the congregation; but not with that application of mind which I ought to have done: but I came rather out of curiosity, to know whether his eloquence was answerable to that opinion the world had of him. ‘I was very attentive to his style, and charmed with the “sweetness of his delivery; but had little value or concern for the subjects he treated of.” Lowth.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

How much wiser are men in their temporal, than in their spiritual and eternal concerns! They set watchmen to guard their houses from robbers or conflagrations; and centinels to give warning of the approach of the enemy: and they best approve of those who are most quick sighted and vigilant, who see the danger at a distance and give the most decisive alarm; and he, who should not give warning, would be deemed by man, as well as by God, accessory to the death of those who were slain through his neglect. But in the concerns of God and eternity, where the appointed watchmen are infinitely more concerned to be faithful, and to give the alarm in the plainest manner; they are sure to give offence to numbers, if they obey their Master’s commands! When they cause the trumpet to give so certain a sound, that every sinner is made to feel himself to be the wicked man, who is “warned to flee from the wrath “to come;” and when “the terror of the Lord” is so placed before men’s eyes, that they tremble at the prospect of eternal damnation; great will be the indignation and opposition excited against them. The most blind, drowsy, greedy, dumb watchman that can be found, is preferred by an immense majority, to one who is thus awful in his warnings, and close in his application to their consciences: they are ready to say to their teachers, “Speak smooth “things, prophesy deceits, cause the Holy One of Israel “to cease from before us:” and any one of Ahab’s lying prophets will be more acceptable, than Micaiah the prophet of the Lord, whom they hate, because he always prophesies evil concerning them! (Notes, 1 Kings xxii. 6—8. Is. xxx. 8—11. lvi. 9—12. P. O. 9—12.)—We cannot then “be men pleasers and the servants of Christ:” but the faithful watchman alone will deliver his own soul; those who perish from under his ministry, will have none to blame but themselves; and he will doubtless have many seals to his ministry, to be “his joy and crown in the day “of Jesus Christ:” whilst the unfaithful watchman will be condemned as the murderer of all those, who perish in their sins, through his negligence, selfishness, cowardice, flatteries, and lies. We who are ministers should frequently meditate on these subjects, and state them to our hearers: that they may know on what ground we stand, and on what principles we act; and perceive, that we must be

CHAP. XXXIV

The shepherds of Israel are sharply rebuked and severely threatened, 1—10. The Lord promises to be plain and faithful, if we would either "save ourselves, or those that hear us."

V. 10—20.

When ungodly men are determined to continue in sin, they will be very ingenious in devising some shadow of a reason for their most unreasonable conduct: and they will endeavour to fasten a charge of inconsistency on those, who "declare the whole counsel of God:" they will pervert the most humiliating truths into a quietus to their consciences, and an excuse for their sloth and lusts; as if God were the Author of their sins, because he is "the Giver of every good and perfect gift!" Thus they rush out of presumption into a kind of desperation, which is often no more than a flimsy covering of downright infidelity: and they pretend that it is of no use to repent, or pray, or use the means of grace, because it is decreed that some sinners (they cannot know who,) shall be left to themselves, and perish in hardened impenitency and unbelief! It is hard to say, whether such men are more desirous of deceiving themselves, or Satan of deceiving them. But surely it proves a strong determination of mind to unbelief, when the Lord declares and confirms it with an oath, that "he hath no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but rather that he should repent and live," that men will not believe him: but, instead of attending to his pressing exhortation to turn from their evil ways, and as if they were in love with death and damnation, will employ themselves in multiplying cavils and objections, which only tend to charge God with injustice, and are constructive blasphemy. For he, who can do all other things, has declared that it is impossible for him to lie, to do injustice, or to deny himself. Let us then bless his holy name, for the provisions of his grace and the security of his word, which assure the true penitent of complete forgiveness and eternal life: and let us also study to profit by his warnings to the righteous, not to "trust to their righteousness and commit iniquity;" and then we shall see cause to bless his name for these also. "Blessed is he that feareth always:" but those who so confide in the promises made to God's people, and so presume themselves to be of that number, as to be emboldened "to commit iniquity;" convert the very mercy and truth of God into "a savour of death," and an occasion of condemnation to their souls: whilst they, who so fear the threatenings of the law, denouncing the sinner's death and damnation, as to take warning from it to repent and turn from all their sins, change that most awful curse into "a savour of life" to their souls. But such penitents always "do works meet for repentance:" and while they trust only in God's mercy through Jesus Christ; they conscientiously make restitution, as far as they are able, for all the injustice and robbery which they have committed; they walk in the ordinances of God and his statutes of life, without returning to the practice of iniquity: they "do justice, love mercy, and walk humbly with their God;" and they shall surely live, and not die. (Note, Mic. vi. 6—8, v. 8.) Instead, therefore, of listening to the suggestions of the devil, of wicked men, or of our own the Shepherd of his scattered flock, and to feed and tend them in his pastures and fold, 11—16; to punish the powerful oppressors among the Jews, and to rescue the oppressed, 17—22. Figurative predictions of Christ and his kingdom, 23—31.

evil hearts, as if the Lord's "ways were not equal;" let us condemn our own ways before him as unrighteous, and seek that "repentance, which is unto salvation not to be repented of;" let us watch against all hypocrisy, and reject every temptation to apostasy, or to pride and self-confidence. Thus "building up ourselves on our most holy faith, and praying in the Holy Ghost, let us keep ourselves in the love of God, looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life." (Note, Jude 20, 21.)

V. 21—33.

It is a peculiar mercy, in times of public calamity, for the Lord to open the mouths of his faithful ministers, and to "give them a door of utterance;" that they may teach the sufferers how to find comfort under their afflictions, and to derive benefit from them.—But how inveterate are the selfishness and presumption of ungodly men! They can rejoice in the misery and death of multitudes, and even of their nearest relations, if they have any expectation of being enriched by them! They often claim an interest in the peculiar blessings engaged to true believers; while their whole conduct as evidently proves them the enemies of God, as Abraham's faith and obedience proved him "the friend of God!" And they call this groundless presumption, strong faith: when the whole testimony of God declares them to be "the children of the devil," entitled to all the threatenings, and to nothing else! For, however men may deceive themselves with vain words; adulterers, thieves, liars, slanderers, covetous persons, and such like, have no inheritance in the promised land; because "for these things the wrath of God cometh upon the children of disobedience." (Notes, 1 Cor. vi. 9—11. Gal. v. 19—21. Eph. v. 5—7. Jam. ii. 19—24.)—Wherever such men seek shelter, "evil pursueth" them; and they will assuredly perish because of all their abominations.—But however unexceptionable the conduct, and however scriptural the doctrine of that "man of God" who constantly affirms such truths; he will be sure to be persecuted, at least with the scourge of the tongue: and it is generally well for faithful ministers, that they do not hear the contemptuous, malicious, and hard speeches, which ungodly men use of them, behind their backs; for it would tend to exasperate or to discourage them. Such persons, however, should remember, that the Lord notes down all the words, which they speak "by the walls or the doors of their houses;" and considers them to be effusions of their contempt and enmity against him. (Jude, 14, 15.) And their malice and scorn are aggravated by hypocrisy, when they come among God's people, to sit and hear his word, on purpose to quarrel with it or ridicule it; as Satan came among the sons of God to obtain permission to do Job mischief.—But indeed various corrupt motives induce men to frequent the places, where the word of God is most faithfully preached. Many, who seem to come with alacrity, and to hear with attention, are brought by direct enmity, that they may find somewhat to object to or oppose: and they even persuade others to accompany them,

AND the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,

2 Son of man, prophesy against ^a the shepherds of Israel, prophesy, and say unto them, Thus saith the Lord God unto the shepherds; ^b Woe be to the shepherds of Israel that do feed themselves! should not the shepherds ^c feed the flocks?

3 Ye ^d eat the fat, and ye clothe you with the wool, ^e ye kill them that are fed; but ye feed not the flock.

4 The ^f diseased have ye not strengthened, neither have ye healed that which was sick, neither have ye bound up that which was broken, neither have ye brought again that which was driven away, neither have ye ^g sought that which was lost; ^h but with force and with cruelty have ye ruled them.

5 And ⁱ they were scattered, ^j because there is no shepherd: ^k and they became meat to all the beasts of the field, when they were scattered.

6 My sheep ^l wandered through all the mountains, and upon every high hill: yea, my flock was scattered upon all the face of the earth, ^m and none did search or seek after them.

that they may join in the same profane opposition. Far more come out of curiosity. Some to exhibit themselves, to form connexions, to please their friends, or to establish a reputation. Others make up their religion wholly of hearing; and suppose themselves excellent Christians, because they attend on faithful preachers, commend their sermons, and "with their mouth shew much love" to the men and their messages: while they will not practise what they hear, but their hearts are wholly turned unto covetousness. Others have a taste for ingenuity, elocution, or graceful delivery: and finding out preachers who have talents of this kind: hearing them is their amusement, instead of a concert or an opera; especially at those leisure hours on the Lord's day when no other places of recreation are open. Thus, even the gifts, as well as the faithfulness of ministers, become "a savour of death" to those, who hear and are delighted with their words, as "with the very lovely song" of one, that hath a pleasant voice, or can play well on "an instrument;" but who will not do them. (Note, Jam. i. 22—25.) It often happens, however, that they, who come at first from such carnal motives, are afterwards brought to a better sense of things, and become doers as well as hearers of the word. So that the minister may be encouraged to be faithful and instant in preaching the word; without anxiously enquiring what brought his auditory together: and then, whether men will hear or forbear, they will know by the event, that a servant of God has been among them; and he will be received at last by his Judge, with "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXIV. V. 2—6. At the time when this prophecy was delivered, Jerusalem was destroyed, the land desolated, and the Lord's flock scattered or destroyed; and the wicked shepherds were about to be called to account, as the principal criminals who had occasioned so great an evil. "The shepherds of Israel" signify their rulers and teachers; their kings and princes, priests and prophets, scribes and elders. (Marg. Ref. a.—Notes, Is. lvi. 9—12. Jer. ii. 8, 9. xxiii. 1—4. John x. 1—5.) The duty of the shepherd is to feed the flock, and to make that his principal object; but they were only careful to feed themselves. They had eaten the fat, or milk, of the flock;

clothed themselves with the wool; and killed the fattest of the sheep, without regarding what became of the rest. They made every advantage which they could from their offices: they exacted their tributes and taxes, their tithes and perquisites, with great earnestness: and they oppressed and even destroyed the people, to enrich themselves: but they bestowed no pains to provide for the welfare of the state, or of the souls of those entrusted to them.—They resembled those shepherds, who utterly neglect the weak and sick of the flock, and leave them to die without attempting their recovery; who, if any have their bones broken or are wounded, do not bind them up; and if any are driven away by robbers or wild beasts, or wander from the fold, never seek to bring them back; but treat the sheep with great cruelty, and are more like ravening wolves, than careful, tender shepherds. Thus the rulers of Israel had neglected to rescue the oppressed, to relieve the destitute, to remedy grievances, to provide properly for the publick safety, to redeem those who had been driven into captivity, or to encourage the return of such as had taken refuge among idolaters. (Marg. Ref. b—h.—Notes, 7—10. xix. 2—9. xxii. 25—28. Jer. v. 26—31. xxii. 13—20. Mic. iii. 1—4. 8—12. Zeph. iii. 1—4. Zech. xi. 4—9. 15—17.) Their teachers also were equally negligent of their souls; they neither encouraged the weak and wavering; nor attempted to remove their error, ignorance, or wickedness, by wholesome instructions, counsels, and examples; nor reclaimed those who were turned aside to idolatry: but they employed their power in exacting upon the people, and made their sacred office a pretence for the most cruel oppressions and persecutions. (Marg. Ref. f, g.—Notes, 11—16. Matt. ix. 36—38. x. 5, 6. xviii. 12, 13. Luke xv. 3—7. John x. 10—18. xxi. 15—17. Acts xx. 28. 1 Pet. v. 1—4.) By these means the people were scattered from the temple, abhorring the sacrifices of the Lord; and from Jerusalem and Judah, to escape the tyranny of their rulers; and so became "as sheep without a shepherd." And by the impolicy, impiety, and wickedness of their leaders, and the fatal effects of the abuse which they made of their authority, they were at length given up to be a prey to the Assyrians and Chaldeans, and other nations, to be destroyed or carried into captivity: so that in the event, the land was utterly desolated; and the Lord's flock, his visible church, was left to wander on the

7 ¶ Therefore, ^uye shepherds, hear the word of the LORD ;

8 As I live, saith the Lord God, surely because ^o my flock became a prey, and my flock became meat to every beast of the field, because there was no shepherd ; neither did my shepherds search for my flock, but ^p the shepherds fed themselves, and fed not my flock.

9 Therefore, ^q O ye shepherds, hear the word of the LORD ;

10 Thus saith the Lord God ; Behold, ^r I am against the shepherds ; ^s and I will require my flock at their hand, ^t and cause them to cease from feeding the flock ; neither shall the shepherds feed themselves any more ; ^u for I will deliver my flock from their mouth, that they may not be meat for them.

11 For thus saith the Lord God : Behold ^v I, even I, will both ^w search my sheep, and seek them out.

12 ^x As a shepherd seeketh out his flock, in the day that he is among his sheep that are scattered ; so will I dark mountains of the heathen, and was scattered over the face of the earth. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. i—m.—Notes, 7—10. 1 Kings xxii. 17. Jer. xiii. 15—21. xxiii. 1, 2. 1. 4—6. Zech. xiii. 7.)—This was at least equally applicable to the rulers, priests, and scribes in the days of Christ, and to the subsequent doom and condition of the Jewish nation.

V. 7—10. For the crimes before charged on the shepherds of Israel, and here again repeated, the Lord declared himself to be “against them ;” and he threatened “to require of them the flock,” which he had committed to them, and which had been ruined by their fault. He would also turn them with disgrace out of their office, and deprive them of all the emoluments of it ; and, as they would not feed the flock, so they should not be allowed to devour it. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 17—22. iii. 17—19. xxxiii. 2—9. Is. lxvi. 19—23, v. 21. Jer. xiii. 18—21. Zech. xi. 5—17. Mal. ii. 1—3. Matt. xxi. 40—44, v. 41.)—The descendants of David were from this time excluded from the temporal kingdom ; the family of Aaron and the tribe of Levi were at length laid aside from their sacred functions ; and numbers, both of magistrates and teachers, were entirely deprived of power to oppress the people and enrich themselves.—‘I will require a severe account of their kings and princes, their priests and prophets, of the damage my people have sustained through their ill management ; and I will deprive them of that honour and pre-eminence which they have made such ill use of ; as I have already displaced Zedekiah, and the princes, priests, and others that were in authority under him.’ Lowth.

V. 11—16. The Lord, having denounced sentence on seek out my sheep, and will deliver them out of all places, where they have been scattered ^z in the cloudy and dark day.

13 And ^a I will bring them out from the people, and gather them from the countries, and will bring them to their own land, ^b and feed them upon the mountains of Israel by the rivers, and in all the inhabited places of the country.

14 I will ^c feed them in a good pasture, and upon the high mountains of Israel shall their fold be : ^d there shall they lie in a good fold, and in a fat pasture shall they feed upon the mountains of Israel.

15 I will feed my flock, and ^e I will cause them to lie down, saith the Lord God.

16 I will ^f seek that which was lost, and bring again that which was driven away, and will bind up that which was broken, and will strengthen that which was sick : ^g but I will destroy the fat and the strong ; ^h I will feed them with judgment.

the shepherds of Israel, next intimated his merciful intentions towards the scattered flock. These he would search and find out, wherever they were. As the shepherd, when his flock has been scattered by wild beasts, gathers them together as soon as he can ; and, having numbered them to see how many are still wanting, he spends the day in seeking for them and bringing them back : so the Lord would seek out his sheep, which had been dispersed by the Chaldeans, in that dark and cloudy day when they besieged and took Jerusalem. (Marg. Ref. z.) He would gather them from all countries, whither they had been driven as exiles and captives ; he would bring them to their own land, and there perform towards them every part of the Shepherd’s office. (Marg. Ref. a—f.—Note, 2—6. Jer. xxiii. 3, 4.) But at the same time, he would punish their proud oppressors, and feed them with judgment, distinguishing between them according to their characters, as it is afterwards declared. (Marg. Ref. g, h.—Note, 17—22.)—Doubtless this primarily referred to the restoration of the Jews from captivity, and their re-establishment and prosperity in their own land : and it was typical of the good Shepherd’s tender care of the souls of his people and kindness to his church, in every age, even to the end of the world.—‘But it seems still to look further, even to the general restoration of the whole nation, which most of the prophets foretell shall come to pass in the latter days. (xi. 17. xx. 41. xxviii. 25. xxxvi. 24. xxxvii. 21. xxxviii. 8. xxxix. 27.)’ Lowth.—The express promises here given, that JEHOVAH himself will feed his flock in the predicted times, compared with the language of the New Testament

17 And as for you, O my flock, thus saith the Lord God; Behold, ⁱ I judge between * cattle and cattle, between the rams and the [†] he-goats.

18 Seemeth it ^k a small thing unto you ¹ to have eaten up the good pasture, but ye must ^m tread down with your feet the residue of your pastures; and to have drunk of the deep waters, but ye must foul the residue with your feet?

19 And as for my flock, they eat that which ye have trodden with your feet; and they drink that which ye have fouled with your feet.

20 Therefore thus saith the Lord God unto them; ⁿ Behold I, even I, will judge between the fat cattle and between the lean cattle.

21 Because ^o ye have thrust with side and with shoulder, and pushed all the diseased with your horns, till ye have scattered them abroad;

22 Therefore ^p will I save my flock, and they shall no more be a prey; and I will judge between cattle and cattle.

23 And ^q I will set up one Shepherd over them, and he shall feed them, even ^r my servant David; he shall feed them, and he shall be their Shepherd.

24 And ^s I the Lord will be their God, and my servant David ^t a Prince among them: I the Lord have spoken it.

25 And ^u I will make with them a covenant of peace, ^v and will cause the evil beasts to cease out of the land: ^w and they shall dwell safely in the wilderness, and sleep in the woods.

26 And I will ^x make them and the places round about ^y my hill a blessing; and I will cause the shower to come down in his season; there shall be ^z showers of blessing.

concerning Christ, our “good” and “great” and “chief” Shepherd;” contains an unanswerable argument in proof of his Deity, as one with the Father. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. y.—Notes, 23—31. V. 17—22. The whole nation seemed to be the Lord’s flock; yet they were of very different characters: but he knew how to distinguish between them, “as the shepherd” “divideth the sheep from the goats.” (Note, Matt. xxv. 31—33.)—The rams and he-goats, or the fat and strong, denoted the rich and powerful, the proud and self-sufficient, the wise and learned of this world. These had got possession of the best estates, and lived in magnificence, luxury, and sensuality: and, not contented with this, they would not suffer the poor to use their leavings in comfort; but continually harassed them with usurious exactions and impositions, with suits and prosecutions, and by every means reduced them to the most abject penury and misery: as if strong and fat cattle, the rams and he-goats, having eaten up the best of the pasture and drunk the deep waters; should wantonly tread down and spoil the residue of the pasture, and render the water turbid and muddy; that the other cattle might starve, or be forced to feed on disrelishing and unwholesome food. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. i—m.—Notes, xxii. 27. xlv. 9. Jer. v. 26—29. Am. iv. 1—3. vi. 3—8. Mic. ii. 1—3. iii. 1—4. 8—12. vii. 1—4. Zeph. iii. 1—4.) This may also be applied to the corrupting of the fountains of religious instruction by the scribes and priests, who “rendered the word of God of none effect, through” “their traditions;” or those false glosses which they hired the false teachers to put upon it. (Notes, xxii. 25, 26. Jer. v. 30, 31. vi. 13—15. xxiii. 7—12. Mal. ii. 4—9.

Matt. xv. 3—9.) But the Lord intended to plead the cause of the poor, the fatherless, and the widow, against their rich and proud oppressors; that the fat cattle might be led to the slaughter, and the lean possess the pasture. The former had used all their superior power to annoy and distress the latter; so the Lord would save them from their hands, and judge between them. (Marg. Ref. n—p.—Notes, Zech. xi. 1—11.)

Seemeth it, &c.] (Marg. Ref. k.) ‘This reproof may fitly be applied to those great persons, who take no care that the poor may enjoy the benefit of their superfluities; but rather let them be thrown away and perish, than they will be at the trouble of seeing them disposed of for the good of those that want.’ Lowth.—‘By good pasture and deep waters is meant the pure word of God, and the administration of justice, which they did not distribute to the poor till they had corrupted it.’

V. 23—31. These verses are evidently a prophecy of Christ, and of the most glorious times of his church on earth. The Lord saved his ancient flock from oppressors and false teachers, and at length raised up among them, and set over them and his church, that one “good Shepherd, whom he had promised from the beginning.” He was called DAVID, because he was descended from that favoured king of Israel, and typified by him; and because he was a Ruler and Teacher of his people after God’s own heart. (Marg. Ref. q, r.—Notes, 2 Sam. vii. 8—11. Ps. lxxviii. 70—72.) The word David signifies Beloved; and Christ is the well beloved Son of the Father, “in whom” “he is well pleased.” ‘The Messiah is elsewhere styled David, as being the person in whom all the promises made to David were fulfilled. (Is. lv. 3. Jer. xxx. 9. Hos. iii. 5.) The expression may likewise allude to David’s

^c ²⁷ And ^e the tree of the field shall yield her fruit, and the earth shall yield her increase, and they shall be safe in their land, and shall ^d know that I am the LORD, ^e when I have broken the bands of their yoke, and delivered them out of the hand of those that ^f served themselves of them.

first employment, which was that of a shepherd.' Lowth. In him the Lord is indeed the God and Portion of his chosen flock: and this his Servant and Son is "a Prince among them," being "Head over all things to his church." (Marg. Ref. s, t.) "Through the blood of his cross," the covenant of peace is made with all his willing subjects, who are "the sheep of his pasture;" and it is established on better promises, than that made with the nation of Israel.—It would conduce very greatly to the security of a flock of sheep, to have all ravenous beasts extirpated from the land: thus the Lord engaged effectually to defend his church, in the days of this promised Shepherd, from all their enemies, who resemble lions, tigers, wolves, or subtle foxes: so that his sheep might dwell safely and rest comfortably, even in the most perilous places. (Marg. Ref. u—y.—Notes, Is. xi. 6—9. xxxv. 8—10. Hos. ii. 18—20.) For, though the powers of darkness, persecutors, and seducers have harassed the church hitherto; yet they have not prevailed against it, nor against any true believer: and ere long Satan shall be chained up, and all persecution and antichristian corruptions shall be terminated. (Note, Rev. xx. 4—6.) Under this "good Shepherd," the church, and all those favoured spots where there are spiritual folds of his sheep, would be made a blessing to the places round about: their pastures would be regularly watered with the rain of heavenly grace; "showers of blessings" would descend upon their souls, while attending on divine ordinances; the numbers of believers would rapidly increase, and the grace and peace of the whole company of them would abound. (Marg. Ref. z—b.—Notes, Jer. xxxii. 39—41. Acts ii. 41—47. iv. 32—35. v. 12—16. ix. 31.) This would especially be the case, when the Lord had broken the yoke of their oppressors, who had enslaved them for their own mercenary purposes: then the heathen would no more be suffered to prey upon them, nor persecutors to devour them; but they would dwell without danger or terror. (Marg. Ref. c—h.) The Lord also promised to raise up to them "a Plant of Renown." This also means Christ; who, though infinitely excellent in himself, and adored by holy angels, was "as a tender plant out of a dry ground," in his incarnation, humiliation, and death; but, springing up in his resurrection, ascension, and heavenly glory, he became greatly renowned on earth, by the spread of the gospel through the nations. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. i, k.—Notes, xvii. 22—24. Is. iv. 2. xi. 1. liii. 2, 3. Zech. iii. 8. vi. 12, 13. Rev. xxii.

ⁱ ²⁹ And ⁱ I will raise up for them a Plant ^{*} of renown, and they shall be no more [†] consumed with hunger in the land, ^k neither bear the shame of the heathen any more.

³⁰ Thus shall ^l they know that I the LORD their God am with them, and that they, even the house of Israel, are my people, saith the Lord God.

³¹ And ^m ye my flock, the flock of my pasture, are men, ⁿ and I am your God, saith the Lord God.

2—5.) And, being indeed "the Tree of Life," bearing all the fruits of salvation, he yields spiritual food to the souls of his people, on which they 'feed in their hearts' by faith with thanksgiving.' So that the true Israel shall not be destroyed by famine, or made ashamed among the heathen; as the nation of Israel has been. (Notes, xxxvi. 13—15. 36—38.) This could have no more than a typical accomplishment in the return of the Jews from captivity, under Zerubbabel, and in their subsequent prosperity. Even the success of the gospel in the primitive times, and the preservation of the church hitherto, form only partial completions of it. But the destruction of antichrist, the calling of the Gentiles, the restoration of the Jews into the church and to their own land, and the consequent peace and prosperity of the church and of the world, fully answer to the energetick language of these predictions. (Notes, xxxvi. 25—30. xxxvii. 20—28. xxxix. 23—29. Jer. xxiii. 3—8. xxx. 22. Hos. iii. 4, 5. Zech. viii. 20—23. Rom. xi. 11—15. 25—32. Rev. xi. 15—18.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10.

No rank or office in the church or in society, can exempt men from the reproofs of God's word, when they neglect their duty and abuse the trust reposed in them: and if the "shepherds of Israel," of the Lord's own appointment, feed themselves and not the flock, woe be unto them! Indeed too many rulers, even in Christian countries, seem entirely to have forgotten the end of their appointment; and act, as if they had been advanced to authority, to gratify their own ambition, cruelty, avarice, luxury, or lust, at the expense of those, whose welfare they ought to have sought in every action, as their great object, in connexion with the glory of God and the salvation of their own souls. So that, while they have utterly neglected to protect the poor and industrious, from the oppressions of the rich; to redress publick grievances, to provide for the destitute, and to guard the peace and prosperity of the community; they have awed men into submission by force and cruelty, and thus for a time silenced every murmur against their tyrannical measures, their oppressive taxes, and bloody executions. Thus they have indulged the mean ambition of growing rich by impoverishing their subjects, and of governing over a company of abject slaves with uncontrouled authority. Such attempts depopulate flourishing kingdoms, and either scatter their inhabitants, by driving them for refuge to other nations; or cause them to be cut off, by exciting insurrections, encouraging invasions, or making way for destructive wars. Though there should be no man able or willing to remedy these evils; yet the Lord will shew himself against such shepherds: he will soon deprive them of their abused authority, and call them to account for all the mischief which their crimes have occasioned; and deliver the people from their mouth, that they may not be meat for them.—But when this negligence, avarice, and wickedness are found in the pastors and rulers of the church; when they feed themselves, but through sloth and ignorance take no care to feed the flock; when they are only intent upon obtaining and multiplying rich benefices, that they may eat the fat and riot in luxury; when they never attempt to instruct the ignorant, to reclaim the erroneous, to alarm the careless, to encourage the broken hearted, the distressed, and tempted, to reform the profligate or restore the backslider, or in any way to bring men to repentance, to faith in Christ, to established peace and holiness of life: when they on the contrary domineer over men's consciences with force and cruelty, as if they were "lords over God's heritage," and fleece and butcher the flock, "which he hath purchased with his own blood;" when they waste the church by fierce persecutions, or infect it with damnable heresies; when the sheep are scattered, because there is no shepherd, but a wolf instead of one, and so fall into divisions and errors, forsake the word and ordinances of God, and are seduced into impiety or infidelity:—in this case the guilt of the shepherd is, and his punishment will be, most aggravated. All the souls, that perish through the default of such men, will be required at their hands; the Lord will be against them, as they are evidently enemies to him; they will at length be driven from their office with contempt and detestation, and stripped of all their honours and emoluments; and their flocks will be delivered from such devourers.

V. 11—22.

"The Lord our Shepherd" will take care, that none of his true sheep shall finally wander or be lost, through the misconduct of those, who are "idol shepherds and greedy dogs." (Note and P. O. Is. lvi. 9—12.—Note, Zech. xi. 15—17, v. 17.) He will either raise up for them "shepherds after his own heart;" or he will supply the want of them by his own care; and will both seek and find every one of them, and convey them to his fold rejoicing.—Thus the incarnate Son of God came into this dreary wilderness, "to seek and save that which was lost:" personally, in the days of his flesh, he went about seeking "the lost sheep of the house of Israel;" and by his apostles and his ministers ever since, he has also gone to search them out all over the Gentile world. Wherever his elect people are scattered, in the days of their darkness and ignorance, he finds them out and brings them into his fold. He also comes to their relief in the dark and cloudy days of persecution and temptation; he heals their backslidings, leads them forth in the paths of righteousness, feeds them in the

MOREOVER ^a the word of the LORD ^{a xxii. 1. xxiii. 1. xxxiv. 1. 2 Pet. i. 21.} come unto me, saying, rich pastures of his ordinances, folds them under his omnipotent protection, and causes them to rest and repose their souls upon his love and faithfulness. He seeks those that wander, and brings back that which was driven away; he binds up the broken-hearted and heals the diseased.—And ought not his ministers then to do the same? Surely none but hirelings will value the emolument or reputation of the ministry, more than this good and useful work: and the true pastor will be ready to endure hardship, to bear reproach and persecution; and to spend and lay down his life for the same ends, for which the chief Shepherd shed his precious blood. But, alas! how few in comparison have there been hitherto, who have laboured and suffered in this disinterested, self-denying, humble, patient, and zealous manner! How few are there, who thus "keep themselves pure from the blood of all men!" (Note, Acts xx. 25—27.) Of how many will the souls of multitudes be required by the chief Shepherd at his appearance, when his faithful servants "will receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away!" Even in this respect, "broad is the way that leadeth to destruction, and many there be that go in at it:" and still it may be said, "All seek their own, and not the things that are Jesus Christ's."—But there is as much difference in character among professed Christians, as among those who bear the name and wear the garb of ministers. It seldom happens that the fat and the strong, the rich and prosperous, are the most flourishing part of Christian congregations: and the proud and self-sufficient are always, either secretly or openly, the enemies of the true Gospel, and of true believers. Such men are "the rams and the he-goats" of the flock: they are ambitious of domineering in the church, as well as in the world: and whilst they think no possession or indulgence too great for themselves, and no subsistence too mean and scanty for their poor brethren; the word of God also must be preached, and his ordinances administered, as best suits their convenience and interest, or soothes their conscience, and gratifies their humour! Thus, through their undue influence, the pasture is trodden down, and the waters are fouled: the good food of pure, experimental, distinguishing preaching, is changed for a more distant, polite, smooth, fashionable, and flattering strain; and the streams of sound doctrine are corrupted. (P. O. Josh. vii. 10—18. Notes, Is. xxx. 8—11. Mic. ii. 6, 7. 11.) And whilst they thus seem to eat up the good pasture, and to drink the deep waters; "the poor in spirit," who relish nothing but the Bread and Water of life, are starved: for they cannot live upon such unwholesome provisions. While we should properly guard against such persons, we must leave it to God to "judge between cattle and cattle:" and when he shall come to separate between the sheep and the goats, (if not before,) he will "destroy the fat and the strong, and feed them with judgment."

V. 23—31.

Our good Shepherd has already ransomed his chosen flock, and is placed as "a Prince over his people." His covenant of peace has been ratified with many: nor shall either temptation or enemy separate them from his love; but they shall dwell and rest safely, even in this howling wilderness, pass securely through the valley of death, and sleep in his arms, as it were, in the silent grave. (Notes and P. O. Rom. viii. 28—39.) Yet the church is still infested with roaring lions, ravening wolves, and every evil beast; and is exposed to manifold persecutions; it is yet as to many things in captivity, and is comparatively of small extent and exceedingly corrupted. We have therefore very much still to hope and to pray for in this behalf. In our several situations we should aim so to live and labour in faith and love, and so to “watch unto prayer,” that we may become blessings to all around us; and that “showers of blessings” may descend on our souls, and the congregations to which we belong. Our constant desire and prayer should be, that there may be “showers of “blessings” in every place, where the truth of Christ is preached; that numerous converts may spring up on every side; that all who profess the gospel may be “filled with “the fruits of righteousness;” that the yoke of Satan, and of every antichrist, may be broken, and the church delivered from all those, who make religion subservient to their personal or political interests: that Jews and Gentiles may be united in Christ Jesus, and form one church; that every partition-wall may be broken down, every corruption purged out, and every boundary removed; and that “the earth may be filled with the knowledge of the “glory of the LORD, as the waters cover the sea.” When thus the nations shall all become acquainted with “the “Plant of renown,” who is both the Feeder and Food of his people; famines and pestilences, as well as wars, will probably cease through all the earth: and it will be known in a most glorious manner, that the Lord is with his church, and that they are his people, and he their God. In the mean time let us admire and rejoice in his condescending love, who has chosen us rebellious men to be the sheep of his pasture, and is become our Shepherd and Salvation: and let us “hear his voice, and follow him, and he will give “us eternal life, and we shall never perish; neither shall

This expectation seems to have excited their ardour in seeking the ruin of the Jews, and in rejoicing over it. But the Lord, the Proprietor of the land, had dwelt there in his temple, and by his ark and visible glory: he had given abundant proofs of his omnipotence, in putting the descendants of Jacob in possession of it and maintaining them in it: and though he had now for their sins given them into the hands of the Chaldeans; yet he reserved that holy land for their posterity, and the Edomites would not be able to deprive them of it. The Edomites not only coveted the fertile inheritance of Israel, and entertained a family and national antipathy against them: but they also hated and despised them because of their relation to JEHOVAH. When they, therefore, saw the land desolated, and the people destroyed or carried captive, they reviled "the mountains of Israel," and thus blasphemed God, as if he had been unable to keep possession; and they boasted and gloried, as if the God of Israel had been overcome, as well as the nation of Israel. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It is of fatal consequence for parents to teach their children resentment or enmity against others; and still more so to instil into them prejudices against the cause and people of God: for these seeds will spring up and yield most pernicious fruit, after they have gone down to the grave.—The wrath of God is loudly proclaimed against those, who have perpetual hatred to his people; and who take advantage of their calamities to insult over them and oppress them. They, who do not "hate blood," may readily be induced to shed it in ambitious wars and cruel persecutions, or by suitable temptations: and then "blood will pursue them," or even a more dreadful punishment.—The Lord himself will punish the crimes of ungodly professors of his holy religion, and chastise his offending children: but he will let his enemies know that he dwells in his church, notwithstanding all her sins and sufferings: and when they think to gratify their malice, envy, or avarice, by oppressing and spoiling his worshippers, he will cease to afflict his offending worshippers, and make his power and vengeance known among their oppressors. He hears and remembers the multiplied blasphemies, boastings, and menaces of profane infidels and persecutors; and he will produce them to their confusion in the day of wrath. And those who continue to "rejoice in iniquity," in ungodly prosperity, or in the calamities of the righteous, shall weep and gnash their teeth in despair, when the joy of the whole church shall be for ever perfected.

at this time uninhabited ; but the Lord had a peculiar favour to it ; and the prophet was ordered to address himself to “the mountains of Israel,” as the most conspicuous parts of the land.—This might be meant as a reproof to such as refused to hear his word : but it was a great encouragement to those who regarded it, and assured them that God had mercy in reserve for them. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 2—8.)

V. 2. ‘The Idumeans made their boasts (5. xxxv. 10,) that they should soon become masters of the mountainous parts of Judea, where the ancient fortresses were placed, which commanded all the rest of the country. To the same sense, we are to understand the expression of “riding on the high places of the earth ;” (Deut. xxxii. 13;) that is, taking possession of the fortresses or passes which command the rest of the country.’ Lowth. Marg. Ref.)

V. 3. The vain talkers among the heathen derided the pretensions of Israel, concerning a divine and exclusive right to the land of Canaan ; as well as the language of the sacred writers, in calling it “the glory of all lands,” and “the Lord’s holy mountain.” Whereas it now lay desolate, uncultivated, profaned, and seized upon by idolaters. Nor did JEHOVAH interfere to make good his claim, in behalf of his people : and they therefore thought, that it might more properly be called an infamous, than a glorious land. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, Deut. xxviii. 37. 1 Kings ix. 7—9. Jer. xviii. 13—17, v. 16. 1. 7, 8. Lam. i. 13—16.)

V. 4—7. “In the fire of his jealousy” for the honour of his name, which had been thus insulted by his enemies, JEHOVAH had spoken against them, and determined to put them to shame and to take vengeance on them ; especially on the Edomites, who considered the land of Israel as already their own possession ; and who rejoiced exceedingly over the sufferings of the Jews, both from covetousness, and the malice and enmity of their despiteful hearts : and they gladly aided the Chaldeans to cast them out, that the land might be a prey unto them. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, 34—36. xxxv. 10—14. Ps. cxxxvii. 7—9. Lam. iv. 21, 22.)

Surely, &c. (5) This seems equivalent to the more general form, by which the Lord swore by himself : and accordingly in the seventh verse it is joined with, “I have lifted up my hand, &c.” (Marg. Ref. u, x.)

V. 8. Marg. Ref.—At hand, &c.] The predicted seventy years of the captivity were wearing away ; and the time would soon arrive for the Jews to repossess and cultivate their own land, and to eat the fruits of it.—‘If we suppose the words to relate to the general restoration of the nation ; the longest distance of time, that the things of this world can extend to, is but as a moment in respect of eternity.’ *Lowth. 12 Yea, I will cause men to walk upon you, even my people Israel; and ⁱthey shall possess thee, and thou shalt be their inheritance, and thou shalt ^kno more henceforth bereave them of men.

13 Thus saith the Lord God; Because they say unto you, Thou land devourest up men, and hast bereaved thy nations;

14 Therefore thou shalt devour men ^lno more, neither ^{*}bereave thy nations any more, saith the Lord God.

15 Neither will I ^mcause men to hear in thee the shame of the heathen any more; neither shalt thou bear the reproach of the people any more; neither shalt thou cause thy nations to fall any more, saith the Lord God.

16 ¶ Moreover the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,

17 Son of man, when the house of Israel dwelt in their own land, ⁿthey defiled it by their own way and by their doings: their way was before me ^oas the uncleanness of a removed woman.

18 Wherefore ^pI poured my fury upon them, ^qfor the blood that they had shed upon the land, and for their idols wherewith they had polluted it:

19 And ^rI scattered them among the heathen, and they were dispersed through the countries: ^saccording to their way, and according to their doings, I judged them.

20 And when they entered unto the heathen, whither they went, ^tthey profaned my holy name, when they said to them, ^uThese are the people of the LORD, and are gone forth out of his land.

21 But ^xI had pity for mine holy name, which the house of Israel had profaned among the heathen whither they went.

22 Therefore say unto the house of Israel, Thus saith the Lord God, ^yI do not this for your sakes, O house of Israel, but for mine holy name's sake, which ye have profaned among the heathen whither ye went.

23 And I will ^asanctify my great name which was profaned among the heathen, which ye have profaned in the midst of them; ^band the heathen shall know that I am the LORD, saith the Lord God, ^cwhen I shall be sanctified in you before ^dtheir eyes.

24 For ^eI will take you from among the heathen, and gather you out of all countries, and will bring you into your own land.

do better, &c. (11) The outward state of the Jews was never so prosperous after the captivity, as it had been before that catastrophe: we must therefore understand this of their preservation from idolatry, and their adherence to the worship of God; and especially of the coming of the promised Saviour. These predictions refer also to a future return of the Jews to their own land, when converted to Christ: and then indeed the Lord "will do better" unto them and their land, than at their beginnings.

V. 13—15. The Canaanites had been extirpated by Israel; and Israel had been destroyed or driven out by the Assyrians and Chaldeans, and by sword, famine, and pestilence: the heathen therefore, who probably were pleased to find a seeming contrariety between the Jewish scriptures and these facts, represented the good land as unwholesome, unfruitful, and destructive of its inhabitants; and yet they were ready to take possession of it for themselves! But the Lord declared, that he would replenish the land, and not suffer it any more to be desolated, as it had been during the Babylonish captivity; and that he would not any more give the heathen occasion thus to reproach it. Though the whole land of Israel was not desolated after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, as it had been after that by the Chaldeans; yet the slaughter made among the Jews was far greater, and they were entirely driven out of the land, and have continued in a state of exile from it for above seventeen hundred years. It seems therefore unavoidable, but that we must refer the full completion of these prophecies to some future event: when the land shall again become fruitful, and be inhabited by the nation of Israel to the end of time. of people. They were noticed as the worshippers of JEHOVAH wherever they went: but they were looked upon as a viler and more worthless race, than any of the idolaters among whom they were driven: and having been carried captive out of their own land, and reduced to a miserable slavery by their enemies, JEHOVAH himself was despised and blasphemed, as if he had been unable to protect his worshippers, and as if there had been no profit in serving him. For many of the gentiles would ascribe their wickedness to the tendency of that religion, which they abhorred; and not to their having acted inconsistently with it: and they would regard their miseries, not as the punishment of their sins, but as proofs that their God was not able to protect them. Thus the name of JEHOVAH was profaned; and this reproach must have rested upon it, had he suffered his enemies finally to prevail against his people. He was therefore determined to shew mercy on them, from regard to the honour of his own name; though there was nothing in their characters to induce him to it. By their reformation he meant to wipe off the dishonour cast upon him by their wickedness: and by gathering them from among the nations, and restoring them to their own land, he intended to glorify his power, truth, and goodness; and to shew himself superior to all the idols of the nations, in the sight of their devoted worshippers. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, 32. xiv. 22, 23. xx. 7—9. 13, 14. 40—44. xxxvii. 28. xxxix. 23—29. Deut. ix. 4—6. xxxii. 26, 27. Ps. cxv. 1, 2. Is. xlviii. 9—11. Jer. xiv. 7—9. Lam. iv. 13—16. Dan. viii. 16—19.)

V. 25—27. In allusion to the divers washings and sprinklings of the ritual law, the Lord promised “to sprinkle clean water, on his people, and to make them clean from all their filthiness and idols.” (Notes and P. O. Num. xix. Notes, Ps. li. 7. Is. lii. 13—15, v. 15.) Clean water is the universal purifier of our persons, garments, houses, streets, and cities: and under both the Old Testament, and the Christian dispensation, it has been used as an emblem of the cleansing of our polluted souls from sin. But no water, however clean, or in what mode soever it be applied, can do more than take away “the filth of the flesh:” except as it is used for an outward sign of the inward and spiritual grace of the gospel. Water is especially the sacramental sign of the sanctifying influences of the Holy Spirit; yet this is always connected with the atoning blood of Christ. (Marg. Ref. d, e.—Notes, John iii. 4, 5. Eph. v. 22—27, vv. 26, 27. Tit. iii. 5—7, v. 5. Heb. x. 19—22, v. 22. 1 Pet. iii. 21, 22, v. 21.) When the latter is applied to the conscience, through faith, to cleanse it from dead works; the former is always applied to all the powers of the soul to purify them from the love and pollution of sin: and thus the sinner is

“washed, and sanctified, and justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God.” (Notes, Ps. li. 1, 2, v. 2. 1 Cor. vi. 9—11, v. 11. Rev. i. 4—6.) Accordingly it is here promised, that the Lord would cleanse both the land, and the souls of the people, from the guilt and pollution of their wickedness and idols; from the filthiness beforementioned (17), which had made them loathsome to him, and rendered a separation necessary. What next follows has before been explained; (Marg. Ref. h.—Notes, xi. 17—20, vv. 19, 20. xviii. 30—32. Ps. li. 10. Jer. xxxii. 39—41:) but it is here added, that the Lord “would put his own Spirit within them.” Having prepared their hearts by his grace, he would dwell in them by his Spirit: and thus holy affections and dispositions being produced, preserved, and continually invigorated by his blessed influence, they would walk in his statutes, and observe and keep his commandments. These blessings would be given them for this purpose, and the Lord would thus efficaciously cause them to do so. (Marg. Ref. i, k.—Notes, xxxvii. 12—14, v. 14. xxxix. 23—29, v. 29. Prov. i. 21—23. Is. xxxii. 15. xlv. 3—5. lix. 20, 21. Jer. xxxi. 33, 34. Zech. xii. 9—14, v. 10. xiii. 1, 2. Tit. ii. 11—14. Heb. viii. 8—13.)—But of whom was this spoken? Doubtless many of the Jews, who returned from Babylon, were thus renewed and sanctified: yet numbers of them continued strangers to these peculiar spiritual blessings, though preserved from outward idolatry. These promises indeed are pleaded by all true believers, in every age, and fulfilled to them: and this may be called the spiritual meaning. But the context speaks so expressly and repeatedly of the house of Israel being restored to the land, which the Lord had given to their fathers, that, in the prophetical meaning, I apprehend, it greatly confirms the opinion, that after the Jews shall be converted to Christ, they shall also be restored to their own land. Then these promises will be fulfilled to them in their fullest sense; and the subsequent part of the prophecy will be literally accomplished, in the sight of all the nations: and the Jews are no doubt preserved a distinct people, on purpose to make way for this great display of the Lord’s power and truth, and thus to demonstrate to all the world the divine original of the holy scriptures. (Note, Jer. xxx. 10, 11.)

V. 28—30. Though Canaan is now become a “barren land, for the wickedness of those who dwelt there—“in:” yet the Lord can easily render it more fruitful than ever; and thus silence the reproach before spoken of. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 13—15. 36. xxxiv. 23—31. Ps. cvii. 33—43. Is. xxx. 23—25. Jer. xxx. 22. xxxi. 27, 28. xxxiii. 6—11. Am. ix. 13—15.)—Many understand these verses of the great success of the gospel in the predicted times.

shall be my people, and I will be your God.

29 I will also "save you from all your uncleanness: and I will °call for the corn, and will increase it, and lay no famine upon you.

30 And I will multiply the fruit of the tree, and the increase of the field, that ye shall receive no more °reproach of famine among the heathen.

32 Not °for your sakes do I this, saith the Lord God, be it known unto you: °be ashamed and confounded for your own ways, O house of Israel.

33 Thus saith the Lord God; In the day that I shall have cleansed you from all your iniquities I will also cause

34 And the desolate land shall be tilled, °whereas it lay desolate in the sight of all that passed by.

36 Then the heathen that are left round about you shall °know that I the LORD build the ruined places, and plant that that was desolate: °I the LORD have spoken it, and I will do it.

If we consider this passage, as a prediction of the conversion of the Jews to Christ, and their restoration to their own land; the iniquities, which they shall especially remember with self-abhorrence, must mean their obstinate rejection of the Messiah, and their long continued opposition to his cause, and all their other sins as resulting from that unbelief. (Note, Zech. xii. 9—14, v. 10.)

V. 32. °The prophet repeats what he said ver. 22, on °purpose to check the vain presumption in the Jews, and °confidence of their own intrinsic worth or merit; a fault °they have been very prone to in all ages.' Lowth.—The extreme care of the inspired writers, in using all means of keeping alive a sense of guilt, and exciting a spirit of deep contrition, even when delivering the most free and enlarged promises of rich mercy, is a most instructive subject of meditation, especially to the ministers of the gospel. (Marg. Ref.—See on Note, 22—24, v. 22.)

V. 33—35. Marg. Ref.—See on Note, 28—30.—Notes, 17. 25—27. Is. li. 1—3, v. 3. Jer. xxxi. 10—14.

Zech. viii. 9—15. 20—23.) °He declareth, that it ought not to be referred to the soil, °or plentifulness of the earth, that any country is rich °and abundant; but only to God's mercies: as his plagues °and curses declare, when he maketh it barren.' (See on Note, 28—30.)

V. 37. Though the Lord would do these things freely °for his own name's sake," and not for any merit or excellency of the people, as they were always disposed to imagine; (Notes, 22—31, 32;) yet he would have them to plead these promises with him, enquiring about the time and manner of their accomplishment, and earnestly begging of him to perform it: and he intended to pour out "the Spirit of grace and supplication" upon them, that they might be excited thus to enquire of him to do it for them. (Notes, Zech. xii. 6—14.) Then Jerusalem and the cities of Judah would be replenished with multitudes of inhabitants, like those who thronged thither to the solemn feasts; rapidly increasing in number, as well as living harmoniously and inoffensively, like flocks of sheep.—This may signify the increasing number of worshipping congregations, all over the land, and in every part of the earth, in those happy days which were predicted. °He will °dispose their hearts to apply themselves to him by prayer, °and will answer the petitions they make to him for the °fulfilling these his promises.' Lowth. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xiv. 1—5. xx. 1—3. Ps. x. 17, 18. Jer. xxix. 11—14.)

V. 38. Some understand by "the holy flock," the sheep and lambs designed for sacrifice at the solemn feasts: but perhaps the assembled worshippers are meant. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. xxxiv. 31.—Notes, Ps. xcv. 7. c. 3.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—15.

The most sacred truths, ordinances, and works of God, and every person or thing which relates to him, are "taken up in the lips of" profane "talkers;" who divert themselves and each other, and gratify their pride and malice, by endeavouring to represent that as despicable and infamous, which God has pronounced holy, honourable, and excellent. Such scoffers triumph and boast upon every apparent success, as if they had swallowed up the church, and she were become a derision and a prey to her enemies:

CHAP. XXXVII.

By a vision of the resurrection of dry bones, the restoration of Judah and Israel from their hopeless condition is prefigured and predicted, 1—14. The reunion of Judah and Israel is predicted, by the uniting of two sticks in the prophet's hand, 15—22. The blessings of their union under Christ their King, 23—28.

and their alacrity and joy in their successful efforts against her are increased, when they can gratify their covetousness, as well as pride and malignity, by these spiteful persecutions. But in this manner they provoke the Lord to jealousy; he will return upon them the contempt and affliction, which they have caused to his people; and punish them for their impious and scornful words, as well as for their unjust and cruel behaviour towards his servants. For, though the truth and cause of God may be borne down for a season, they cannot be kept down: the mountains of Israel, however wasted, profaned, or forsaken, will again be peopled, cultivated, and rendered fruitful: yea, the Lord is with his people; "who then can be against them?" And the time is at hand, when he will purify and settle his church, and replenish her with numerous converts, and do better for her, than even in the beginnings of the gospel-dispensation. Then will he silence the calumnies, cavils, and objections of the ungodly: every part of the word of God will appear to all men to be verified by undeniable facts; and the whole history of mankind shall shew the truth of the scriptures, the excellency of our holy religion, and the happiness of the people of God.

V. 16—27.

When we consider the abominations, which have hitherto prevailed in the visible church, we shall not wonder, that the Lord has repeatedly put away one part or another of it, with abhorrence and indignation; but shall rather admire his patience and mercy, in still maintaining his cause amidst such multiplied provocations: and when we compare his justice and holiness with our own guilt and pollution, and recollect how we have defiled ourselves and all his good gifts, by "our evil ways and doings;" we shall often be amazed, that he has not ere this "poured out his fury upon us," and punished us according to our deservings. But "the glory of his own great name" always supplies him with motives for doing good to his people: and even when he cuts off hypocrites and apostates, and severely corrects his offending children, he will not have his honour profaned among his enemies, by letting them wholly trample down his worshippers: so that he will render his cause triumphant in the event. Not that he will connive at the sins of those who are "called by his name;" for this would still more embolden the blasphemies of ungodly men: but he will "save his people from all their sins:" and when he separates them from the company of those that perish, he will also "re-deem them from all iniquity, and purify them unto himself a peculiar people zealous of good works."—Indeed he finds us all "foolish, disobedient, deceived, slaves to divers lusts and pleasures," and polluted with those abominable things which he loathes and abhors: but when "the loving kindness of God our Saviour towards us is made manifest, he saves us by the washing of regeneration and the renewing of the Holy Ghost, which he pours upon us abundantly through Jesus Christ our "Saviour." (Notes, Matt. i. 21—23. Tit. ii. 11—14. iii. 4—7.) These blessed influences, like purifying water, then bedew and cleanse all the powers of our souls; and our being "cleansed from all filthiness," and from the love and power of every sin, and detached from idolatrous affections for every created object, proves our interest in "the blood of sprinkling," and shews that our sins are forgiven. (Notes, Hos. xiv. 1—8.) When the Lord speaks, and says, "I will, be thou clean," the leprosy of our depraved nature is cleansed: he who first created our souls can new-create them to holiness, now that sin has marred their beauty and ruined their health. He gives all his believing people "a new heart, and puts a new spirit within them:" the heart of stone is then changed for a heart of flesh, and becomes susceptible of every holy affection: then they are influenced in a proper manner by his word and Providence: and the blessed Spirit of God, dwelling in his new creatures, as a Teacher, Sanctifier, and Comforter, gently leads them to walk, with increasing liberty and delight, "in all his commandments and ordinances blameless." (Note, Luke i. 6.)

V. 28—38.

Our God is ever ready to fulfil his most precious promises to every one, who perceives his need of them and their suitableness to his case, and who pleads them by prayer in the name of our glorious Advocate: and thus the most polluted and inveterate transgressor may become a humble, holy, and spiritual worshipper and servant of God; one meet to be numbered with his people, and to enjoy his favour as his all-sufficient and eternal Portion. And when the Lord thus "saves men from all their uncleanness," he will supply all their wants, and cause every event to concur in doing them good.—A humble disposition of mind, leading a man frequently to remember his evil ways with loathing and self-abhorrence, and cordially to confess his unworthiness of the least mercy, even while he expects the richest blessings from the abounding grace of God, is an essential and inseparable concomitant of "the new heart and spirit" bestowed on true believers. Nor is there any more decisive proof that a man is yet in his sins, than a disposition to justify himself, and to expect the divine favour as the reward of his own goodness. (Note, Luke xviii. 9—13.) The Lord will make it known to all the heirs of salvation, and that in proportion to their growth in grace, that "boasting is for ever excluded," that shame and misery are all which such sinners can deserve; and that they are saved "to the praise of the glory of his grace," and for the honour of his great name. This conviction prepares them for every duty on earth: and when they shall come to glory, it will induce them to cast their crowns before the throne, and to ascribe salvation to God and to the Lamb for evermore. In some of these promises, the Lord, as it were, passes by, and says to the sinner, "Wilt thou be made clean?" "Ask me, and I will cleanse thee;" and so waits to be enquired of by them to do these things for them, and to do them more and more perfectly for believers: others of them invite us to pray for the increasing purity, prosperity, and spread of true religion. He waits to be enquired of by his people to fulfil these prophecies, and to fill the earth with his holy flock, and with the congregations of his saints. Let us then give ourselves unto prayer, and turn all these promises and predictions into petitions and supplications; and thus seek increasing holiness, fruitfulness, and comfort to our own souls, and expect more glorious times for the church of God.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXVII. V. 1—10. The predictions of the preceding chapter, taken in their fullest sense, seemed very unlikely, and almost impossible, to be fulfilled, considering the ruined and dispersed state of Judah and Israel. The prophet was therefore shewn in a vision, by what power and in what way they would be performed. Under the influence of the prophetick Spirit, he was carried in a vision “into the midst of a valley” full of human bones: like those places in which fierce battles had been fought and very great multitudes slain, who had been left unburied till the flesh was all consumed, and the bones were dried, divided, and scattered about. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. a—c.) When he had gone round and carefully surveyed these bones, and found them “very many and very dry;” the marrow from within, as well as the flesh from without being utterly wasted; God enquired of him, “Can these “dry bones live?” To which he answered with a proper mixture of humility and faith, “O Lord God, thou knowest.” No created power could restore them to life: but if God should please to put forth his power, they might be raised from the dead and live. (Marg. Ref. d, e.—Notes, Matt.

xxii. 23—33, v. 29. John iii. 3—5. v. 28, 29. Acts xxvi. 4—8, v. 8. Heb. xi. 17—19.)—The Lord then ordered him “to prophecy upon these bones,” to predict their resurrection, to call upon them to hear his word, and to speak over them the promises that follow, concerning their being reunited, and restored to life, that they might know his power and Godhead. This would appear even a more hopeless service, than to prophecy “the restoration of ‘Israel’ to their ancient prosperity, or to preach to the most hardened sinners: yet he started no objections, but obeyed his orders. (Marg. Ref. f—k.—Note, John ii. 1—5, v. 5.) And while he was speaking, he seemed, in vision, to hear a noise, and to see a great commotion among the bones; for behold, they were, so to speak, every one in quest of its kindred bone, and, under the divine direction and influence, each speedily found its proper place, and was jointed to those bones which belonged to the same body, till the whole were formed into a vast number of complete skeletons: and then sinews, flesh, and skin covered them, and they became entire human bodies, yet without life. The prophet was next ordered to “prophecy to the wind,” and to command it, in the name of the Lord God, to blow from the four quarters of the heaven upon these slain men, that they might live: and while he obeyed his orders, they were restored to life, and he was surrounded with a very large army.—“The wind” seems to have been the emblem of the Spirit of God, the Author and Giver of life: and the same original word signifies both wind, breath, and the Spirit. This therefore represented the prophet’s calling upon God by his Spirit to quicken these dead bodies, that by his power they might become living men. (*Marg. and Marg. Ref. l—o.—Notes, 11—14. 13 And ^t ye shall know that I am the LORD, when I have opened your graves, O my people, and brought you up out of your graves, vision was an instructive emblem of the power of God operating by means, which of themselves must be entirely inefficacious, and thus producing most stupendous effects.

V. 11. The dry bones, indeed, aptly represented the ruined and desperate condition of both Israel and Judah: yet the language which the Jews employed was that of unbelief mingled with impatience; second causes seemed to give them no prospect of deliverance; and they overlooked the great first Cause of all: they therefore considered the state of the nation to be as desperate as that of the dry bones. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xxxiii. 10. Num. xvii. 12, 13. Is. xl. 27—31. Jer. ii. 25.)

V. 12—14. When Cyrus issued his proclamation, the Lord, as it were, opened the graves of the house of Israel; and when he stirred up their spirits to embrace the proffered liberty, he put his Spirit into them, that they might live: and their re-establishment in their own land evinced the truth of God in the prediction, and his power in its accomplishment. (Marg. Ref.—Ezra i. 1—6.)—‘That principle of life expressed by breath or spirit, ver. 9, not excluding that new Spirit of grace, which God will at that time plentifully bestow upon them. (xi. 19. xxxvi. 26, 27.) The principle of grace is often spoken of as a higher principle of life, and the earnest of our heavenly happiness. Rom. viii. 11. 1 Cor. vi. 17. xv. 45.’ Lowth.—The vision was evidently intended, in its primary meaning, to encourage the desponding Jews; and to predict both their restoration after the captivity, and also the recovery of Judah and Israel from their present long continued dispersions. But it was also a clear intimation of the resurrection of the dead; and it likewise represents the power and grace of God in the conversion of the most hopeless sinners to himself. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Is. xxvi. 19. lxvi. 10—14. Hos. vi. 1—3. xlii. 14. Luke xv. 22—24, v. 24. John v. 24—29. Rom. viii. 10, 11. xi. 11—15, v. 15. 1 Cor. xv. 45—49. Eph. ii. 4—10, vv. 4, 5. Rev. xi. 7—12, v. 11. xx. 4—6. 11—5.)

V. 15—19. The prophet was next ordered to (take two sticks, or small pieces of wood;) and to signify by writing on each, that the one was the emblem of Judah, and those of the other tribes who had joined themselves unto them under the government of the house of David; and that the other was the emblem of the tribes of Ephraim, Manasseh, and the several tribes which formed the kingdom of Israel. These he was directed to join together, that they might become one stick in his hand. When he did this before the people, they would conclude that he had some prophetick meaning in it, and enquire whether he would not inform them of it: and he was ordered to shew them, that the Lord would unite the two kingdoms by his power, and in consequence of their union with him. Their disunion had greatly weakened them, and their furious contests had made immense havock of both; and thus they became a prey to their common enemies. But it was here predicted, that they should be united and established together in the service and favour of God.—This was partially accomplished after the Babylonish captivity, when all the Israelites, who returned with the Jews from Babylon, settled under the same government and formed with them one nation. But it is highly probable, or indeed certain, that there will hereafter be a far more remarkable accomplishment of it. It may also be considered as an emblem of the union of the Jews, Israelites, Samaritans, and Gentiles in the church of Christ, being all made one by their union with him, their common Head; and an intimation of a more entire harmony among professing Christians, than has yet taken place. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 20—22. Num. xvii. 2—5. 2 Chr. xiii. 13—22. Is. xi. 11—16, v. 13. Jer. l. 4—6. Hos. iii. 4, 5. Zech. xi. 7—14.)—‘Ezekiel foretold many things by signs; and the Jews were very inquisitive into the meaning of them: though sometimes their curiosity proceeded rather from a secret contempt of the prophet and his predictions, than a real desire of information. 22 And ^g I will make them one nation in the land upon the mountains of Israel; ^h and one King shall be King to them all: and they shall be no more two nations, neither shall they be divided into two kingdoms any more at all.

23 Neither ⁱ shall they defile themselves any more with their idols, nor with their detestable things, nor with any of their transgressions: ^k but I will save them out of all their dwelling places, wherein they have sinned, and will cleanse them: so shall ^l they be my people, and I will be their God.

24 And ^m David my servant shall be King over them; and they all shall have ⁿ one Shepherd: ^o they shall also walk in my judgments, and observe my statutes, and do them.

It is plain, that the times subsequent to the coming of the Messiah were here especially intended: for it was promised, that both Jews and Israelites should be gathered into their own land, and become one nation under one King, and that that King should be David (24): but they were never governed, as one nation, by any king, to whom the name of David could properly be given, from the time of the captivity to the coming of Christ, who is several times called David. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14.

The almighty power of God is expressly engaged to perform his whole word; and therefore our objections and doubts, arising from difficulties or apparent impossibilities, are the offspring of ignorance and unbelief. That omnipotent word, which once spake this fair creation into existence, and still upholds it; and which shall hereafter call forth from their graves the innumerable millions of the dead, to a life of endless happiness or misery; must be sufficient to remove all obstacles, and effect all purposes, that form a part of the divine plan. On this power ministers ought absolutely to depend, when they preach the gospel: for the state of those, who are dead in sin and enmity against God, slaves to Satan and their own lusts, and habituated to various evils, is as desperate in itself, and they are as much without strength, without either will or power to save themselves, as these dry bones were: nor could any created power restore them to God and holiness. But the true minister has some experience of “the exceeding greatness of that mighty power, which wrought in Christ, when he was raised from the dead,” and which has wrought and still works in every believer: and he knows it to be sufficient to soften the hardest, and to cleanse the most polluted heart. When he therefore considers the case of proud infidels and Pharisees, or of abandoned profligates and blasphemers; the Lord as it were asks him, Can these dry bones live? Can such be made his saints and servants? And his answer is, “LORD thou knowest.” If he please to work, the dry bones will live: nor can we make a single exception to this rule, without limiting the power of our God. But though the work be wholly his: yet he commands us to use means: and if he ordered us to preach to the dry bones in a charnel-house, it would be our wisdom and duty to obey; and pride and unbelief alone could start objections. If sinners then were as devoid of life and sense as the dry bones, we ought to preach to them, and to call on them to “hear the word of the LORD,” and to set before them his truths, invitations, and promises; warning, exhorting, beseeching, and persuading them to come to Christ for salvation; and to hope that God would powerfully work, whilst we were using the appointed means. But the incapacity of sinners, though equally entire, is of another kind: they are rational creatures, whose understandings, consciences, affections, and imaginations may be addressed, and who are capable of fears, hopes, and desires. Surely then we should be ready at the Lord’s command to go to the highways and hedges, in order to invite and even “compel men to come in,” as far as arguments and persuasions can do it; to beseech rebels to be reconciled to God, and to command them to repent and believe the gospel; accompanying all our endeavours with earnest prayers, that the Spirit of God may come and breathe on dead sinners, that they may live.

Under this kind of preaching various effects will be produced: many will be made to tremble, and to enquire what they “must do to be saved?” And a great commotion will sometimes be excited among those, who have been careless and secure: there will be a gathering of the people to hear the word, and to confer about matters of religion: numbers will be induced to attend on the means of grace; and even those, who eventually are converted, often do many things outwardly before they are actuated by a vital inward principle. We should indeed be careful not to rest in any thing short of true conversion; and we should warn the people not to settle in forms, notions, or external reformation: yet this “shaking among the dry bones” may encourage us to proceed, preaching earnestly, praying fervently, and waiting patiently: and we may hope in due time to see a large company of spiritual soldiers, warring under the banner of Christ, against sin, the world, and the devil, raised up from those who before “were dead in trespasses and sins.” Let us also remember, that the same power is equally engaged to raise the church from her lowest depressions, and our souls from the deepest discouragements; and to perform all that for us and ours, which is truly good for us. Our part is to use proper means, to wait and pray, and not to yield to discouragement, because of difficulties, as if our hope was lost, or we were cut off, when our trials are heavy, and our prospects gloomy. But let us look to him, who will at last open our graves and bring us forth to judgment, that he may now deliver us from sin, and put his Spirit within us, and “keep us by his power through faith unto salvation:” then we shall at last come forth victorious from all our conflicts, and for ever bless God for our present sharpest tribulations.

Nothing has so hindered the success of the gospel hitherto, as the divisions among professed Christians: and it requires the same power of God to unite discordant persons and parties, so that they may “be one in his hand,” as is requisite to raise his church from the most discouraging situation. They who desire the prosperity, should labour and pray for the peace of Jerusalem: and in this sense especially, “Blessed are the peace-makers, for they shall be called the children of God.” We have all one King and Shepherd, and are all one nation and family; nay, one body, as united to Christ our Head: how unnatural for us then to be as two or several armies, fighting against and weakening each other! Let us then study and “endeavour to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace:” let us with one accord seek for divine grace, to keep us from any more defiling ourselves with our idols, detestable things, or any transgressions: let us pray that the Lord would in like manner cleanse his church; that he may be known among the nations, as the Sanctifier of Israel: let us thank him, that he has set his tabernacle among us, by his gospel and appointed ordinances; and beg of him to continue it in the midst of us for evermore;

AND the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,

2 ^a Son of man, ^b set thy face against ^c Gog, the land of ^d Magog, ^e the chief prince of ^f Meshech and Tubal, and prophesy against him.

3 And say, Thus saith the Lord God; Behold, ^g I am against thee, O Gog, the chief prince of Meshech and Tubal:

4 And ^h I will turn thee back, and put hooks into thy jaws, and I will bring thee forth, and all thine army, ⁱ horses and horsemen, ^j all of them clothed with all sorts of armour, even a great company with bucklers and shields, all of them ^k handling swords:

5 ^l Persia, Ethiopia, and ^m Libya with them; all of them with shield and helmet:

6 ⁿ Gomer, and all his bands; the house of ^o Togarmah of the north quarters, and all his bands, and many people with thee.

7 Be ^p thou prepared, and prepare for thyself, thou, and all thy company that are assembled unto thee, and be thou a guard unto them.

8 After ^q many days, ^r thou shalt be visited: in the latter years thou shalt come ^s into the land that is brought back from the sword, and is gathered out of many people, against ^t the mountains of Israel, which have been always waste: but it is brought forth out of the nations, and they shall dwell safely all of them.

NOTES

CHAP. XXXVIII. V. 2, 3. 'The prophecy, contained in this and the following chapter, concerning Israel's victory over Gog and Magog, without question relates to the latter ages of the world, when the whole house of Israel shall return into their own land. (xxxix. 25, 26.) ... "Gog, the land of Magog;" or "of the land of Magog." Magog was the son of Japheth, (Gen. x. 2,) from whence the Scythians are generally supposed to be derived. The Mogul Tartars, a people of the Scythian race, are still called so by the Arabian writers. ... By Gog and Magog may most probably here be meant the Turks; who were originally natives of Tartary, called Turcheston by the Eastern writers. ... The land of Canaan hath been, for several years, in the possession of the Turks. ... The people called here by the name of Gog, and their allies, will attempt to recover it again out of the hand of the Jews, its rightful owners. This may, probably occasion the war and victory here spoken of. ... The LXX interpreters take the word Rosh, commonly translated chief, for a proper name: so they render the sentence thus: "The prince of Rosh, Meshech, and Tubal." Rosh, taken as a proper name, signifies those inhabitants of Scythia, from whence the Russians derive their name and original. Lowth.—It is not indeed agreed what people or transactions are here predicted: but it seems evident, that the prophecy is not yet accomplished. Nothing occurred in the wars waged by the Syro-grecian kings against the Jews after the captivity, or in their conflicts with Antiochus Epiphanes, that answer to it: and it is foretold, that these events would be fulfilled "in the latter days." It is therefore probably supposed, that the accomplishment will be posterior to the conversion of the Jews, and their restoration to their own land: and that the Turks, Tartars, or Scythians, from the northern parts of Asia, perhaps uniting with the inhabitants of some more southern regions, will make war upon the Jews, and be cut off in the manner here predicted.—Gog and Magog are mentioned by St. John. (Note, Rev. xx. 7—10.) It is probable that the inhabitants of the same regions are intended; but different events are evidently predicted: for that assault of Gog and Magog will follow the millennium, and happen just before the general judgment; but this refers to the times which will introduce the millennium.—"Gog" seems to be the name of the prince, "Magog" of his land or people. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, xxxii. 26—28. Gen. x. 2—5.)

V. 4. These formidable enemies will certainly be induced to make this formidable invasion of the land of Israel: and then God will defeat it, as he did that of Sennacherib, by putting his hook in their jaws, &c. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xxix. 2—5. 2 Kings xix. 27, 28. Dan. xi. 40—45.)

V. 5. Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Note, xxx. 4, 5.

V. 6. 'Gomer was Japheth's son, and Togarmah the son of Gomer; these are thought to be they that inhabit Asia Minor. ... The Persians from the east, the Ethiopians from the south, the Moors from the west, and the Phrygians from the north, shall join with them in this onset.' Bp. Hall.

V. 7. (Marg. Ref.) This is an ironical exhortation to Gog, to make all possible preparation, and to use every precaution to defend himself and his army, and to ensure victory: and it intimates, that God will thus gain the greater honour by his defeat. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 16, 17. Is. viii. 9, 10. Jer. xlvi. 3, 4. Joel iii. 9—17.)

V. 8. 'This judgment shall be inflicted by God upon thee, ... after a succession of many generations: "in the latter years," or "days" (16); that is, towards the end of the world: (Comp. Dan. viii. 26:) particularly the 9 Thou shalt ascend and come like a storm, thou shalt be like a cloud to cover the land, thou, and all thy bands, and many people with thee.

10 Thus saith the Lord God; It shall also come to pass, that at the same time shall things come into thy mind, and thou shalt think an evil thought:

11 And thou shalt say, I will go up to the land of unwallled villages; I will go to them that are at rest, that dwell safely, all of them dwelling without walls, and having neither bars nor gates,

12 To take a spoil, and to take a prey, to turn thine hand upon the desolate places that are now inhabited, and upon the people that are gathered out of the nations, which have gotten cattle and goods, that dwell in the midst of the land.

hast thou gathered thy company to take a prey? to carry away silver and gold, to take away cattle and goods, to take a great spoil?

14 Therefore, son of man, prophesy and say unto Gog, Thus saith the Lord God; In that day when my people of Israel dwelleth safely, shalt thou not know it?

15 And thou shalt come from thy place out of the north parts, thou and many people with thee, all of them riding upon horses, a great company, and a mighty army:

16 And thou shalt come up against my people of Israel, as a cloud to cover the land: it shall be in the latter days; and I will bring thee against my land, that the heathen may know me, when I shall be sanctified in thee, O Gog, before their eyes.

17 Thus saith the Lord God; Art thou he of whom I have spoken in old time by my servants the prophets of Israel, which prophesied in those days many years, that I would bring thee against them?

expression of "latter days" or years, is used to denote the times of the general restoration of the Jewish nation. (Deut. iv. 30. Jer. xxx. 24. Hos. iii. 5.) Lowth. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 11—17. xxxvi. 3—15.)

Always waste.] Long in a state of desolation, namely, first by the Assyrians, Babylonians, Antiochus Epiphanes, and Romans; lastly, and at this time, by the Turks.—Desolations far more durable, than those of the Babylonish captivity, are evidently predicted.

V. 9. Marg. Ref.—Notes, 16, 17. Is. xxv. 3—5. xxviii. 1—4, v. 2. Dan. xi. 40—43.

V. 10. The Lord foresees, from ages and generations, every thought, good or bad, that will ever come into the mind of any of his creatures, and every purpose of their hearts; and all these infinitely numerous apparent contingencies form a part of his immense and glorious plan! (Marg. and Marg. Ref. y.)

V. 11, 12. The converted Jews and Israelites, will live in peace, and holy confidence in God, without attempting to molest others, or fear of being molested: they will therefore have neither walls, gates, nor bars; and this will tempt these depredators to invade them. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, xxxiv. 23—31, v. 28. Judg. xviii. 7—10. Jer. xxiii. 5, 6.)

V. 13. Those merchants, as soon as they heard of this intended invasion, came into Gog's camp, as to a market, to buy both persons and goods, which should come into the conqueror's power. ... Their chief merchants... are described as so many princes, Is. xxiii. 8, and are called how, because of the injustice and oppression they too commonly practised in their commerce.' Lowth.—'One enemy shall envy another, because every one shall think to have the spoil of the church.' (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xxvi. 2. xxvii. 10—25. Rev. xviii. 9—19.)

V. 14, 15. As soon as the news of their being settled in their own country comes to thy knowledge, thou wilt certainly make preparations to invade them.' Lowth. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 2—4. 10—12.)

V. 16, 17. The exact accomplishment of these ancient prophecies will turn to a testimony to the nations that shall witness them: and they will recollect, that thus it was written, and thus it had come to pass. 'This signal victory over Gog and his associates, shall be a means of bringing infidels to give glory unto me. (xxxvi. 23. Comp. xxxix. 21.) ... The expressions here used, ... plainly imply, that there was to be a succession of many ages, between the publishing those prophecies, and this event foretold by them.' Lowth. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, 10—15. Ps. cx. 5, 6. cxlix. 7—9. Is. xxvii. 1. xxxiv. 1—6. lxiii. 1—6. Dan. xi. 40—45. Joel iii. 9—17. Zech. xii. 2—8. xiv. 1—3. Rev. xi. 15—18. xiv. 14—20. xix. 11—21.)—Gog, according to this prophecy, will come against Israel, as settled in their own land: and the effect will be the conversion of the heathen: but Gog and Magog, as foretold by St. John, will "compass the camp of the saints," and the beloved city, which evidently mean the true church after the millennium: and "fire will come down from God out of heaven and devour them;" and immediately the day of judgment will follow. (Comp. Notes, Rom. xi. 11—15, with Rev. xx. 7—15.)

18 ¶ And it shall come to pass at the same time, when Gog shall come against the land of Israel, saith the Lord God, ^p that my fury shall come up in my face.

19 For ^q in my jealousy and in the fire of my wrath, have I spoken, ^r Surely in that day there shall be a great shaking in the land of Israel;

20 So that ^s the fishes of the sea, and the fowls of the heaven, and the beasts of the field, and all creeping things that creep upon the earth, and all the men that are upon the face of the earth, shall shake at my presence, and the mountains shall be thrown down, and the ^{*} steep places shall fall, and every wall shall fall to the ground.

21 And ^t I will call for a sword against him throughout all my mountains, saith the Lord God; ^u every man's sword shall be against his brother.

22 And ^x I will plead against him with pestilence and with blood; and I will rain upon him, and upon his bands, and upon the many people that are

with him, ^y an overflowing rain, and great hail-stones, fire, and brimstone.

23 Thus will I ^z magnify myself, and sanctify myself; ^a and I will be known in the eyes of many nations, and they shall know that I am the LORD.

V. 18—20. At the terror of the wrath of God and by his judgments on these invaders, all nature will be, as it were, thrown into convulsions at his presence, and concur in executing his vengeance on them. V. 21—23. 'God's decrees are expressed by his speaking the word and giving out the command. ... (Ps. cv. 16.)' Lowth.—Some think that the Lord will send assistance to Israel, by the armies of Christian princes. In addition, however, to all external opposition, he will occasion discord among the invaders, and they shall destroy one another; as well as perish by pestilence, hail-stones, and fire and brimstone. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xlii. 10—16. xiv. 13—21. Gen. xix. 24, 25. Josh. x. 11. Judg. vii. 16—22. Is. xxix. 5, 6. xxx. 29—32, v. 30. Rev. xvi. 17—21.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

When God most effectually works to promote his cause, and to prosper his church in unity and purity; Satan will be most busy (if permitted,) in exciting his servants, with combined efforts, to oppose it: and they, who on other occasions are most hostile to each other, often unite to fight against his people. But he, whose all-seeing eye penetrates the deepest recesses of the human heart, through long series of ages, yea, from eternity; and who foresees what things will come into men's minds, and what evil thoughts they will think, is equally able to disappoint their devices. In vain do men prepare for the defence and success of themselves and their companions, when God is pleased to fight against them; for "though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not be unpunished."—Those, who enjoy the Lord's protection are safe, and may be secure, though they have no other defence.—It is most atrocious to devise mischief against those who serve God in quietness and honesty, and who are harmless, inoffensive, and unsuspecting. But the love of riches, and the hatred of God and holiness, incite men to the most base and destructive enterprises: and when any dwell securely, bad men soon know of it, and mark them as their prey. Hence, alas! it is become necessary for those communities, which desire peace, to learn and encourage war as a science and a trade. (Notes, Is. ii. 2—5. Rev. xx. 4—6.)—All opposition to the cause of God will eventually tend to sanctify his great name, and to fulfil the writings of his ancient prophets; and that in proportion as it is formidable.—Those who love to terrify their neighbours, will be made to tremble at the power and indignation of the Lord. The whole creation will concur in the destruction of his devoted enemies: nay, they will help forward their own and each other's ruin, till they are driven by the tempest of his jealousy into "the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone;" and thus he will be magnified and sanctified upon all those, who refuse to submit to him and serve him.

11 ¶ And it shall come to pass in that day, that I will give unto Gog a place there of graves in Israel, the valley of the passengers ^y on the east of the sea: and it shall stop the ^z noses of the passengers: and there shall they bury Gog and all his multitude: and they shall call it, The valley of ^{aa} Ha-mon-gog.

12 And seven months shall the house of Israel be burying of them, that they may ^{ab} cleanse the land.

13 Yea, all the people of the land

Leave, &c. (2) Or, "I will strike thee with six plagues." (Marg.—Note, xxxviii. 19—23.)—It seems probable, that none of the invaders will escape the general destruction: but perhaps the inhabitants of Magog in general are meant. The immense army of Gog, led forth to invade Israel, will almost empty his land; and the subsequent judgments of God, upon those that remain at home, will reduce them to the sixth part of the whole. (Note, 6.)

And will cause thee, &c.] 'The words may be better translated, "After I have caused thee to come up, &c."'

V. 6. Some terrible judgment will destroy those countries, whence the army of Gog was led forth; about the same time that the army itself shall be cut off.—"They that dwell carelessly in the isles," may denote the allies of Gog before-mentioned. (Notes, xxxviii. 5—7. 13.)—"I will send my fierce judgments upon the enemy of my church; and upon those that being separated and guarded by the sea, live securely confident of their safety." Bp. Hall. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.)

V. 7. 'I will not suffer my name to be dishonoured any more; nor let it be said among the heathen, that I was not able to rescue my people out of the hand of their enemies.' Lowth. (Marg. Ref. 21, 22. See on Note, xx. 9. Notes, xxxvi. 20—24. xxxvii. 28. xxxviii. 16—23.)

V. 8. This was predicted above two thousand years before the event: yet the prophet spake of it, as already come and done, to denote the certainty of it; and as seeing in vision its actual accomplishment. 'The time appointed for this great destruction is come; and it is the last and finishing stroke of God's justice upon the enemies of 'his church.' Lowth. That is, before the millennium. (Note, xxxviii. 2. Is. lxvi. 15—18.)—"This plague is fully 'determined in my counsel, and cannot be changed.' (Marg. Ref.—Notes, vii. 2—11. xxxviii. 16, 17. 2 Pet. iii. 8. Rev. xvi. 17—21, v. 17.)

V. 9, 10. The language, here used, seems to imply, that the army of Gog will be cut off by miracle, as that of Sennacherib had been: for the people are described, as going forth, not to fight and conquer, but merely to gather the spoil. (Notes, 2 Chr. xx. 22—25. Ps. lxviii. 11, 12. Is. xxxiii. 23, 24.) The immense destruction of the invaders is illustrated by the circumstance (perhaps hyperbolic) of the weapons found among the slain, serving for fuel during seven years, at least to the inhabitants of the adjacent cities. But when it is considered, how little fuel comparatively is needed in warm climates, we may even conceive of this being literally fulfilled. The Israelites, however, will neither reserve these weapons for their own use, nor form them into trophies of their victory; but use them for fuel. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. p, q.—Note, Ps. xlvi. 8, 9.) 'In token, of an entire conquest, and that 'such a lasting peace should ensue, that there should be 'no more need of warlike preparations.' Lowth.—It is supposed that this prediction will be fulfilled just before the millennium; at which happy period, "men shall every "where beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears "into pruning hooks; nation shall not rise against nation, "neither shall they learn war any more." (Notes, Is. ii. 2—5. Rev. xx. 1—6.)—Shall spoil, &c. (10) Marg. Ref. r.—Notes, Is. xiv. 1, 2. xxxiii. 1.

22 So the house of Israel shall ^k know that I am the Lord their God, from that day and forward.

23 And ^l the heathen shall know that the house of Israel went into cap-

Israel for his army and people: but the Lord will only give them "a place of graves" in some part of it; and not even that, till their bodies have lain for some time unburied. The multitudes of the slain will infect the air with their stench, and cause the travellers to stop their noses; or they will die in the way, and obstruct those that are passing on the road. So that the Israelites must bury them, though they had neither trouble nor peril in vanquishing them. This will be the work of seven months to all the people of the land; that is, of all such, as can be spared from other needful employments. But it will be necessary in order to cleanse the land.—No doubt the prophet referred to the ceremonial law, in this passage; though that law will not be regarded, when this prediction shall be fulfilled: but it will be also needful to cleanse the land from the natural defilement, which might otherwise cause an infection.—This labour of Israel will bring great honour to them, as well as redound to the glory of God.—'The valley, near this sea,' ... (of Gennesaret,) 'is called "the valley of the passengers;" because it was a great road, by which the merchants and traders from Syria, and other eastern countries, went into Egypt. ... All the people shall be employed seven months in burying the dead (13): and after they are ended, particular persons, appointed for that purpose, shall make a clear riddance.' Lowth. (*Marg. and Marg. “hide his face from them,” and to leave them in the hands of their enemies. In like manner they were expelled from the land by the Romans, and continue in a captive or exiled state to this day; because they rejected and crucified Christ, and pertinaciously fought against his gospel: and he has dealt with them accordingly. But when he shall at length have mercy on the whole house of Israel, by converting them to Christianity for the glory of his own name; and when they shall have “borne the shame” of being cast off for their sins, while they dwelt safely in their own land, and shall again be gathered into it: then the nations shall perceive his justice, truth, and goodness in his dealings with his people, and shall learn to know, worship, and serve him: and Israel also shall know the Lord their God, in a humbling spiritual manner, as revealed in and by Jesus Christ, whom they have so long rejected. At that time they shall all be gathered into their own land: and the Lord will “no more hide his face from them,” or leave them in the hand of their enemies, as he will “have poured out his Spirit upon them,” and thus made them his holy worshippers and servants.—The return of a few Jews from Babylon, and their continuance, increase, partial reformation, and prosperity, till the days of Christ, followed by their present long continued dispersion, under the frown of God, and destitute of his Spirit, could in no degree answer to these predictions. We are therefore constrained either to explain them exclusively of the blessings conferred on the church at large; or to conclude that some future events, exactly answerable to them, shall take place in respect of the nation of Israel: and this latter interpretation is far more consistent with the most obvious method of explaining the scriptures. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS

V. 1—16.

The Lord will surely make all men, even the most careless and inveterate transgressors, know his holy name;

either by the power of his righteous indignation, or by the riches of his mercy and grace: and he will at length silence every objection to his dispensations, and not suffer his holy name to be polluted any more.—This time is at hand: the day of which God has spoken is about to be ushered in; his promises and judgments will soon be exactly accomplished: let us then go forth to meet him by faith and prayer, and anticipate the approach of his promised blessings, to ourselves and to his church. Speedily the weapons of war, which are so much in use all over the world, will be rendered needless. Indeed they might now be all burned, or buried in the depth of the sea, to the great benefit of mankind; and they would be thus disposed of, did not men more resemble Satan, in pride, malice, and treachery, than God their Creator and Judge, in justice, truth, goodness, and mercy; and if they did not take more delight in robbing, murdering, or domineering over others, than in love and good works. Yet it is the common lot of spoilers to be spoiled and slaughtered, by those whom they seek to injure.—After all the disturbance, which is made by men of vast ambition or insatiable avarice, and after all their mighty expectations and achievements, “a place of graves” is all the Lord gives them on earth: and sometimes even this is denied; that the indignities exercised towards their dead bodies may be an emblem of the contempt and misery, to which their guilty souls are doomed in the invisible world.—It is our duty to shew a humane disposition even towards the most injurious: yet self-love may suffice to induce the survivors to bury the dead. It should therefore moderate our regard to these mortal bodies, and their decoration and indulgence, and our attention to external accomplishments in others, to consider, that commonly, in two or three days after death, the human body becomes too deformed a spectacle, to be looked on without horror by those, who used most to love and admire it.—When the Lord is glorified in the ruin of his enemies, and in the good conduct and prosperity of his people; it becomes a day of great renown to them: but it is the chief renown of any land, when all ranks and orders of men concur in cleansing it from the filthiness of sin, which is far worse than any natural or ceremonial pollution whatever. This is a good work, which will require persevering diligence, that it may not be done superficially; but that search may be made into the secret recesses of iniquity, by persons severed for that service, and with the assistance of all that are able to give them information, or in any way concur in promoting their great and beneficial designs.

V. 17—29.

The most mighty and prosperous of sinners are only fattened for the slaughter, like “the bulls and rams of Bashan:” at length they will all be made a sacrifice to justice, for the display of the glory of God, before the nations of the earth: whilst the poor and afflicted people, that trust in him, shall certainly know and experience his power, truth, and love, in their full deliverance and advancement in due time.—But even the professed people of God often fall into the hands of their enemies, or into divers and sore calamities; because they have trespassed against him, and he deals with them according to their uncleanness and their transgressions. And indeed, if true believers yield to temptation, and commit deliberate wickedness, the Lord will hide his face, and inflict sharp correction on them; and they will walk in darkness, and their enemies will seem to insult over them. But, though they may thus be deserted, tempted, corrected, and distressed; yet they have a sure refuge in the Lord's mercy: for a season they bear their shame; till being truly penitent, he again has mercy on them, for the honour of his own name; and then they dwell safely and comfortably under his protection, and none can make them afraid. For, the name of God will finally be hallowed: his cause will be triumphant on earth, and in heaven: he will yet have mercy on the dispersed house of Israel, and gather them out of their captivity: and he will never finally hide his face from any of those, on whom he has poured out his sanctifying Spirit. But we must not expect to be wholly exempted from temptation, distress, and trouble, till we enter heaven: then we shall be filled with the Spirit of holiness, and behold the face of our God, without one frown or intervening cloud for evermore.

V. 2. (Notes, viii. 1—4. 2 Cor. xii. 1—6.) The vision, contained in the remainder of this book, is allowed by commentators to be one of the most obscure in the sacred scripture: so that it is not fully agreed what city, temple, and land were intended; or whether it had reference to former or to future times; whether it is to be understood literally or figuratively; whether it relate to the church on earth, or that in heaven. Some think the following description of the temple was intended to shew what Solomon's temple had been: (Notes, 1 Kings vi. vii.) others explain it of the second temple, and of the city, after they were rebuilt and arrived at their greatest prosperity. There can, indeed, be little doubt, that the grand outlines of the description were taken from Solomon's temple, with all the additions made to its courts and outbuildings in after ages; and that in many particulars, it may be considered as a model of it, when destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar. We may also suppose, that Zerubbabel, Joshua, and the other Jews, had respect to it, as far as circumstances would permit, in rebuilding the temple after the captivity. There are, however, several circumstances, which conclusively shew, that something exceedingly superior to either the first or second temple was intended; and that the external description must be considered as a figure and emblem of spiritual blessings. (Note, xli. 22.) This will appear, in many particulars, as we proceed: but especially the dimensions of the temple, city, and land; and the division of the land to the prince, priests, and tribes; and the river of water springing from the threshold of the temple, enlarging till it reached the dead sea, and sweetening its waters; with “the trees” growing “on the banks of the river, bearing fruit every month;” cannot be literally interpreted, or made to accord with any thing which has yet taken place. (Notes, xlv. xlvii. xlviii.)—“The general scope of Ezekiel's temple is, by giving a promise of restoring Solomon's, to preserve the Jews from defiling themselves with idolatry during their captivity; and when the time of that should be expired, to encourage them to go home and rebuild their temple, and observe the laws and ordinances prescribed by Moses, for performing God's worship there; which yet was never to be equal to Solomon's in every respect, before the Messiah should come, ... whose church should resemble Solomon's temple, in symmetry and beauty, in firmness and duration, in a regular, orderly, and decent worship of the true God; and in the manifestation of the divine presence, at first by the miraculous gifts of the Holy Ghost, and ever since by the inward assistances,

3 And he brought me thither, and, behold, there was a man, ^k whose appearance was like the appearance of brass, ^l with a line of flax in his hand, and a measuring reed; and he stood in the gate:

4 And the man said unto me, Son of man, ^m behold with thine eyes, and hear with thine ears, and set thine heart upon all that I shall shew thee; for to the intent that I might shew them unto thee art thou brought hither: ⁿ declare all that thou seest to the house of Israel.

5 And behold ^o a wall on the outside of the house round about, and in the man's hand a measuring reed of six cubits long, ^p by the cubit and an hand breadth: ^q so he measured the breadth of the building, one reed; and the height, one reed.

6 ¶ Then came he ^r unto the gate ^s which looketh toward the east, and went up ^t the stairs thereof, and measured the ^u threshold of the gate, which was ^v one reed broad; and the other threshold of the gate, which was one reed broad.

' comforts, and protection of the same Spirit.' Lowth.—The state of the church, however, in that happy period which we are taught to expect, seems to be emblematically predicted.—'Nothing is more usual, than for the prophets to describe the state of the Christian church, by representations taken from the Jewish temple and service.' Lowth. (Notes, Is. lx. lxvi.)—If we would judge of the propriety, with which those glorious days were predicted under such allusions; we must place ourselves in the situation of the pious Jews when in captivity, who favoured the very dust and stones of their city and temple; (Note, Ps. cii. 13—22, vv. 13, 14;) and who could not well detach their ideas of the church's prosperity, from that of the external splendour of the sanctuary; or conceive of more glorious times for the worship of God, abstracted from the expectation of a larger temple or city.—It is probable that the more immediate accomplishment of the prophecy will be subsequent to the conversion of the Jews, their restoration to their own land, the destruction of Gog and Magog, and the pouring out of the Spirit, mentioned in the close of the foregoing chapter: and it will perhaps continue through the thousand years, during which Satan will be chained up in the bottomless pit. (Notes, xxxviii. xxxix. Rev. xx. 1—6.) But whether there will be any external forms, analogous to those here predicted, cannot be determined; though in some respects it seems very improbable. It is, however, absurd to attempt laying down rules for church-government, discipline, or modes of worship, from so obscure a vision: seeing men of lively imaginations and contrary sentiments may, perhaps with equal plausibility, accommodate it to their several systems.—In general the vision seems to have been intended, both to remind the Jews of what they had lost by their sins, and so to lead them to repentance; and to encourage their hopes of the final prevalence of the cause, which was at that time so greatly depressed.

A very high mountain, &c.] 'Mount Moriah, whereon the temple was built, which is here called "a very high mountain," because it represents the seat of the Christian church, foretold by the prophets, that it should be "established on the top of the mountains." (Is. ii. 2. Mic. iv. 1. Comp. Rev. xxi. 10.) Mount Moriah lay southward of the hill of Zion, ... though ... northward of the lower part of the city, ... commonly called ... Jerusalem.' Lowth. (Marg. Ref. i.)—"The very high mountain," however, is not said to have been Moriah, or Zion. (Notes, xvii. 22—24. Is. ii. 2—5. Dan. ii. 34, 35. 44, 45.)—The prophet saw on the south, the frame or plan of the city, which would at length be builded, and which he afterwards repeatedly mentioned; though he was directed first to describe the courts and the temple.

V. 3. A man, &c.] Many suppose this man to have been the eternal Son of God, anticipating his incarnation by appearing in human form. He is the Builder, as well as the Foundation and Corner-stone, of the spiritual temple: and "his appearance as brass" might denote his durable stability and glory, in his person and mediatorial government. (Rev. i. 15.) Yet, as the glory of God in Christ has been shewn to be the scope of the introductory vision, (Notes, i. x.) and as the same glory appeared to the prophet in this vision, when the man here spoken of was present; (Note, xliii. 2—5;) it may be questioned, whether he were not a created angel. 'The use of the line was to measure the land; ... and of the reed to take the dimensions of the buildings in and about the temple.' Lowth. These may denote his revealed word, or secret decrees, according to which he will regulate every thing that relates to the doctrine, worship, and practice of his church. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Zech. ii. 1—5, vv. 1, 2. Rev. xi. 1, 2.)

V. 4. 'He proposes to the prophet two duties, always necessary; that he should diligently learn from God, and faithfully deliver what he hath received.' (Marg. Ref.—Notes, ii. 7, 8. xliii. 10, 11. xlv. 5. 1 Cor. xv. 1, 2. Rev. i. 1—3.)

V. 5. This wall is supposed to have surrounded the temple and all its out-buildings: and it may be an emblem of the church's separation from the world, and its security under the divine protection.—The reed, with which the prophet's instructor measured, is computed to have been nearly four yards long: though some think that the ordinary Jewish cubit is meant, and distinguished from that which was used in Chaldea; and that the reed was not much above three yards long. The outward wall is stated to have been one reed in "breadth," or thickness, and one "in height." (Marg. Ref.—Note, xlii. 15—20.)

V. 6. The gate of the outward court, in which the Israelites worshipped, seems to be intended. 'The Angel passes by the court of the gentiles, and does not measure it; (Rev. xi. 2;) perhaps signifying, that the multitude of the nations, flowing into the church, could not be comprised in any measure or number.—‘The word Saph, translated threshold, signifies the lintel, or upper part of the door case, as well as the threshold properly so called, or the lower part of it.’ Lowth. These were equal in dimensions to the thickness of the wall. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.)

V. 7. The entrance into the outward court seems to have been through a porch, with doors at both ends; and on each side of this porch were three small chambers, or rooms, a reed square in size, with a passage of five cubits between them.—‘The inward threshold, at the farther end of the porch, looking into the first court, was of the same size with the outer one (6).’ Lowth. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xlii. 4—13.)

V. 8. Or, “He even measured, &c.” (1 Kings vi. 5—10.)

V. 9. “The porch of the gate, ... (7) and the posts thereof,” seems to have been a portico, or pent-house, on the inside of the entrance beyond the chambers, projecting eight cubits, and supported by posts or pillars, two cubits in circumference; which carried off the wet, and served for shade and shelter, to those who entered into the outward court.

V. 10. ‘These rooms were for the use of the porters, that took care of the several gates that led to the temple.’ (1 Chr. ix. 18. 23, 24. xxvi. 12, 13. 18.) The side-posts, or fronts of the doors, belonging to each row of chambers, were of the same size.’ Lowth. (Note, 7.)

V. 11. The width of the gate, or door, at each end of the entrance, (perhaps including the door-posts,) was ten cubits; and the height thirteen cubits, or about twice the height of the wall.

V. 12. (Marg.) A space of a cubit, in width, seems to have been separated by some rail or fence on both sides, from the passage, before each of the little chambers; to keep off the throng of those who entered into the court, chambers was one cubit on this side, and the space was one cubit on that side: and the little chambers were six cubits on this side, and six cubits on that side.

13 He measured then the gate from the roof of one little chamber to the roof of another: the breadth was five and twenty cubits, door against door.

14 He made also posts of threescore cubits, even unto the post of ^a the court round about the gate.

15 And from the face of the gate of the entrance, unto the face of the porch of the inner gate, were fifty cubits.

16 And there were ^{*} narrow windows to ^b the little chambers, and to their posts within the gate round about, and likewise to the ^c arches: and windows were round about ^d inward: and upon each post were ^e palm-trees.

V. 13. The whole arch of the east-gate, measured from the southern extremity of one room to the northern extremity of the opposite room, was twenty-five cubits: including the dimensions of the two rooms, or twelve cubits (7); the spaces before the rooms, or two cubits (12); and the breadth of the entrance, ten cubits. This makes twenty-four cubits; and the other cubit seems to have been taken up by the walls of the rooms, inward, towards the entrance. The doors of the rooms, on each side the entrance, seem to have faced each other.

V. 14. The word, rendered “posts” and “post,” is by many supposed to mean pent-houses. Perhaps the verse may signify, that the pent-houses to the chambers, and within the porch toward the court, when the several measures were added together, amounted to sixty cubits in extent.—Some, however, explain it, to mean the height of the three stories of chambers, one above another. (Marg. Ref.—Note, xlii. 5, 6.) The angel is said to have made, what he delineated before the prophet, in the pattern or frame which he shewed him.

V. 15. ‘The whole length of the porch, from the outward front, (xli. 21. 25,) unto the inner side which looks into the first court (17), was fifty cubits; which may be thus computed: twelve cubits for the thickness of the wall at each end (6); eighteen for the three chambers on each side (7); and ten cubits for the spaces between the chambers; allowing the same space between the chambers on each side, and the two walls.’ Lowth.

V. 16. ‘Every one of these little chambers (7) had a narrow window to it, toward the inside of the gate where the passage was; and so there was over the side-posts or fronts, placed at the entrance of every chamber. ‘seems equivalent to that which is more fully expressed, 1 Kings vi. 4, by “open and narrow windows;” that is, “as the margin of our Bibles doth very well explain it “broad within” (to disperse the light) and “narrow “without.”’ Lowth. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Note, 1 Kings vi. 4.)—The arches seem to have been built above each door, with a window in them; as it is generally practised in many cities at present.—Palm-trees.] Marg. Ref. c.—Note, 1 Kings vi. 31—35.

V. 17. “The outward court” was within the porch above described; but without, or more distant from the temple than the inner court. It is supposed to have been surrounded by cloisters, or porticos, with a pavement under them; and over these were chambers, for the use of the priests and Levites; or rather for storehouses, in which to preserve the sacred oblations. A different word is used for these chambers, than that before translated “little chambers;” and they seem to have been distinct from them. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xlv. 1—8, v. 5. 1 Chr. ix. 4—33. xxiii. 24—28. 2 Chr. xxxi. 11—14. Neh. x. 35—39.)

V. 18. Perhaps there was a pavement, between the porticos on each side, facing the entrance called “the lower pavement,” because the pavement on each side, under the porticos, was raised higher than this was.

V. 19. The distance between the inner door, into the outward court, and the door at the other extremity into the inner court, was a hundred cubits. The way to the temple was a continued ascent; so that the door into the inner court was “the higher,” that into the outward, “the lower,” gate. The width of this part of the court from south to north was the same as the length from east to west. At least this seems the most obvious construction of the concluding words. (23. 27. 47. Marg.)

V. 20—23. The north-gate, into the outward court, and every thing relating to it, which is next described, was made nearly, if not exactly, in the same manner as the east-gate. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, 6—10.)

Before them. (22) Or, ‘suitable to them; that is, to ‘those of the east-gate.’ Lowth.—The gate, &c. (23) Note, 19. ‘The north-gate of the inner court did exactly answer this north-gate of the outer court: and in ‘like manner the east-gate of the inner court answered ‘the east-gate of the outward court.’ Lowth.—‘The gate ‘of the inner court was over against the gate, (that is, ‘of the outward court,) as well on the north side as on ‘the east.’

V. 24—27. (Marg. Ref.—Note, 20—23.) It seems there were no gates on the west; though the courts may be supposed to have extended, by the sides of the temple, to the western wall: at least the square, at first described, within the surrounding wall, would admit of this. (Note, 5.)

V. 28. The outward court inclosed the inner, on the east, north, and south sides. Thus the prophet was led from the south-gate of the outward court, to the south-gate of the inner, which was over against it: and so into the inner court itself.

V. 29—31. (Notes, 8—15.) The entrance into the inner court seems to have been through a portico, like that at each gate of the outward court, with little rooms for porters, and spaces between of the same dimensions, and with a pent-house towards the outward court: but the ascent was by eight steps; whereas the outward court had but seven.—‘The fifteen Psalms from the hundred and twentieth forward called “Songs of degrees,” or ascents, are supposed to have been sung on some of these steps ‘or ascents.’ Lowth.—The arches (30), are supposed to have been built over the spaces which separated the porters’ lodges; and to have been twenty-five feet in height. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.)

V. 32—37. The east and north gates were built in the same manner, as the south gate. (Marg. Ref.—Note, 29—31.)

V. 38. Just within the portico of the north entrance, beyond the chambers, was the place, where the legs and entrails of the sacrifices, especially of the burnt-offerings, were washed. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Ex. xxx. 18—21. Lev. i. 5—9.)

V. 39—43. No tables, to be used for this purpose, are mentioned either in Exodus and Leviticus, or in the account given of Solomon’s temple.—Those learned men, who suppose that such were used at the tabernacle and temple, seem to draw this conclusion, either from the Jewish traditions, or from this part of Ezekiel’s vision: whereas this seems to intimate the introduction of a new and more spiritual dispensation. Ref.*—Notes, 1 Chr. vi. 31, 32. xxv. 1—6. Neh. xiii. 4—13.)

V. 45, 46. The word chamber may mean a row of chambers; of which there seems to have been three: one for the singers, one for the priests, who in their courses took care of the sacred vessels and treasures; and one for the priests, who attended on the altar and sacrifices. V. 47. The inner court was of the same dimension with each division of the outward court: and the altar stood directly before the porch of the temple. (19. 23. 27.)

V. 48, 49. The length of the porch was the same as the breadth of the temple; that is, twenty cubits. Two doors of three cubits wide, opening each way, seem to have formed the entrance; these with five cubits on each side, called “the post of the porch,” amount to sixteen cubits; and the other four cubits may be supposed to have been the distance from these posts to the outside of the walls of the temple.—The breadth of the porch, in Solomon’s temple was only ten cubits, or half the length; but here it is represented as eleven cubits. The ascent from the inner court into the temple was by steps; and there were two pillars as in Solomon’s temple. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 9. xli. 3. 1 Kings vi. 2, 3, v. 3. vii. 15—22.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

In the depth of the tribulations of the church and of believers, our gracious God commonly gives some distant glimpses of approaching deliverance and comfort, to support their faith and patient expectation.—The great Builder of the spiritual temple, whose power and glory are infinite and eternal; always works by rule: and, whilst he performs his secret counsels, he requires us to compare all our works with the standard of his word. This we should study carefully, that we may be “fellow-workers together with him;” and that our worship and obedience may be regulated by faith, and not by fancy or carnal wisdom. We should therefore “behold with our eyes, and hear with our ears,” “and set our heart upon” all that the Lord sheweth us; attending to the whole revelation of his will, and seeking the teaching of his Spirit; that we may be “thoroughly furnished for every good work;” and, if employed as ministers, may be able to “declare the whole counsel of God” to the people.—Every part of scripture is divine, useful, and important, in different ways, or to different persons; but it may not all be so immediately useful to us: others have had, and others will have, the benefit of some portions, which are to us not so intelligible or full of instruction. But if we cannot understand or edify by any part of scripture, we should humbly acknowledge our own ignorance, and adore the divine wisdom and knowledge; and not allow ourselves to start objections on that account. Yet, as some portions are more clear, and, to us at least, more important than others: so a fondness for the study of the obscure parts in preference to the obvious, and for “the tithing of mint and cummin, “above the weightier matters of the law,” is a folly and a temptation sometimes even of godly men.—The church of God and all Christians are separated from the world, and protected by God; they are built on an immoveable foundation, and exalted in excellency and privilege above the nations of the earth; and they are continually and gradually ascending towards the sanctuary above.—“A little “chamber,” in this true temple, is preferable to the most magnificent palace of the wicked: how glorious then must be the many mansions prepared in heaven for the disciples of Christ!—There are even now very numerous churches of the saints; yet we may hope and pray, for their immense increase in numbers, and in grace and peace. They are all supported and sheltered by omnipotence: they have their measure of light, through ordinances and instruments, from Christ “the Light of the world,” by which they may walk and work comfortably: but it is not sufficient to gratify the thirst of knowledge in those, who cannot be content to “see through a glass darkly.” Into these churches men have access as living members by faith in Christ; there they “flourish as the palm-tree,” by communion with God and his people; and they shall at length be made more than conquerors.—The nearer we approach to God in profession or office, the more spiritual we should be. This will be best effected by daily looking to and feeding on our great Sacrifice, ‘by faith in our ‘hearts with thanksgiving:’ nor should we be slack to commemorate his death, who has “washed us from our “sins in his blood, and made us kings and priests to God;” that we may here, in the courts of his temple, ripen for our removal to the sanctuary above, there to rejoice in his love and glorify his name for evermore.

8 I saw also the height of the house round about: the foundations of the

NOTES.

CHAP. XLI. V. 1. ‘By the posts are meant the ... ‘door-cases on each side of the entrance. (xl. 9. 48.) ‘These were six cubits thick, on the north and south sides. ‘... The same thickness had the upper lintel over the door. ‘... The word which we render tabernacle, ... sometimes ‘signifies a covering. ... (Ex. xxvi. 7. xxxvi. 14.) In this ‘signification it may not be unfitly applied to the upper ‘lintel, which is a kind of covering to the door.’ Lowth. —Some understand the verse of pent-houses, in the front of the porch, on each side, six cubits wide, with a covering of the same dimensions. (Marg. Ref.—Note, xl. 48, 49.)

V. 2. The door, out of the porch into the sanctuary, seems to have been wider than that out of the court into the porch: (Note, xl. 48, 49:) but the whole length of the porch is still made out to be twenty cubits, perhaps including the side-walls.—The dimensions of the first sanctuary, and of the most holy place (4), accord with those in Solomon’s temple. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—1 Kings vi. 2, 3, v. 2. 15—22, v. 17. 31—35. 2 Chr. iii. 3—8.)

V. 3. The partition wall, between the sanctuary and the holy of holies, is supposed to have been two cubits in thickness: the breadth of the wall on each side the gate seven cubits; and the entrance into the most holy place six cubits in width.

V. 5, 6. Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Six cubits. (5) ‘The ‘thickness of the wall from the foundation; the first story ‘of the side-chambers. ... At five cubits height from the ‘ground, the wall, or the buttresses, which supported these ‘outward chambers, abated of their thickness one cubit; ‘and there was a rest or ledge of one cubit’s breadth, on ‘which the ends of each story were fastened: ... they were ‘not fastened in the main wall of the house.’ Lowth. (Notes, 1 Kings vi. 5, 6. 10.) The nethermost side chambers in Solomon’s temple were five cubits wide.

V. 7. ‘So much of breadth was added to the side-chambers, as was taken out of the thickness of the wall: so ‘that the middle story was one cubit larger, and the upper- ‘most story two cubits larger, than the lower rooms. And ‘winding stairs, which enlarged as the rooms did, went ‘up between each two chambers, from the bottom to the ‘top: and there were two doors at the top of each pair of ‘stairs, one door opening into one room, and the other ‘into that over against it. (1 Kings vi. 8.)’ Lowth. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Note, 1 Kings vi. 8.)

V. 8. This may mean, that the prophet from the upper chamber had a view of the height of these buildings, which surrounded the temple: and, including the rests, as a part of the foundation on which they were supported, it was a full reed, or six large cubits in width. (Note, xl. 5.)—‘By “the house” is meant these chambers three stories high, in which sense the word beth (house) is used ver. 6.’ Lowth.

V. 9. This seems to be meant of the outward wall, which inclosed the side-chambers. The dimensions are large: but the whole structure was erected to be very strong and durable.—The space of five cubits is thought by some to have been also allowed as a walk before the chambers. (Note, xlii. 4.)

V. 10. A different word is here used for “chambers” than before: and some suppose that another row of buildings, at twenty cubits distance from the side-chambers, is intended. There was a row of chambers joined to the temple; and another row of buildings, parallel with them, with a passage of ten or eleven yards in breadth between them, besides the place that was left, before spoken of (9).—But the description, and the various explanations of different commentators, are very obscure: and probable conjecture seems all that can be attained to on the subject.

V. 11. ‘The doors of the lower rooms opened into the void space between the chambers.’ Lowth. This was the case, both of those chambers, which were on the south side, and those on the north side of the temple. Perhaps all the doors faced this void place; an area from the stairs leading to it on each side (9).

V. 12. It has been supposed that there was a row of buildings, on the south and north sides of the temple, (besides the side-chambers,) with a space of twenty cubits between: and perhaps some building was erected on the west end of the temple, seventy cubits wide and ninety long, with a wall five cubits thick. Some, however, understand the verse of a wall, which was continued from east to west, on the outside of all the buildings before-mentioned, by the sides of the temple, to the extent of ninety cubits, and at the west end to seventy cubits.—From north to south is called its breadth, as it corresponded with the width of the temple; from east to west its length, as it was parallel with the length of the temple.

V. 13—15. These verses seem to mean, that the temple, with the buildings and spaces above described, occupied an area of a hundred cubits square, in the centre of which the temple itself was placed. (Marg. and Ref.)

V. 16. Marg. and Marg. Ref.—From the, &c.] ‘He measured from the ground up to the windows of the temple, which were placed above the side-chambers. “The windows were covered,” either because the side-chambers, jetting out beyond the main wall of the temple, hindered their being seen in the inner court; or else they were covered on the inside with curtains drawn before them.’ Lowth.

V. 17. The windows were placed above the height of the door, at the east end of the temple; and were continued at measured distances, at the same height along the wall, on both sides of the holy place, to the wall of the inner sanctuary; in which there were no windows.—The windows on the out-buildings seem likewise to be included, which were placed at regular distances, and made in exact proportion. (Marg.)

Lowth.—The two faces, which were most conspicuous, seem to be intended. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—1 Kings vi. 29.—Notes, i. 5—14, v. 10. x. 1, 2.)—Unto above the door. (20) That is, to the windows.

V. 21. 'The lintels or door posts, both of the temple and inner sanctuary were not arched, but square; with a flat beam or upper lintel laid upon the top of the side-posts.' Lowth. (Marg. and Ref.)

V. 22. "The altar of wood," must signify that on which incense was burned. (Note, xliii. 13—17.)—The dimensions are here much larger than those mentioned in Exodus; but that made by Solomon is supposed to have been larger than that made by Moses. (Marg. Ref. s.—Notes, Ex. xxx. 1—6. 1 Kings vi. 15—22, vv. 20. 22. vii. 48—51.) Both of these, however, were covered with gold: and it is very remarkable, that in this temple described by Ezekiel, there is not the least mention made of gold or silver; though there was such a profusion of these metals, both in the tabernacle made by Moses, and in Solomon's temple. Does not this imply, that a glory of a more spiritual nature was intended under these emblems? Thus the glory of the second temple was greater than that of the first, because honoured by the personal presence of Immanuel. (Note, Hag. ii. 6—9.)

This is the table, &c.] Some suppose, that the altar of incense is here called a table, because of the incense laid upon it, and presented to God: and others that the table of shew-bread was pointed out to the prophet, when his Instructor said, "This is the table, &c."—May not an intimation be here given, that under the New Testament, a table would be substituted for the altars of the Old Testament, in that ordinance, by which we are admitted to the nearest communion with our God and Father? (Marg. Ref. t.—Note, xlv. 15, 16.)

V. 23, 24. 'The two doors being exceeding large, ... each of them had two leaves, that they might be more easily opened.' Lowth. (Marg. Ref.—Note, 1 Kings vi. 31—35.)

V. 25, 26. 'There was a wainscot work of boards,

'fastened to the end of the great beams, which came out beyond the wall of the porch. These were laid so as to make a frieze-work over the entrance into the eastern porch. ... The figures of palm-trees were carved on that wainscot.' Lowth. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 16—20.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

When we carefully improve our instructions, concerning the introductory parts of religion, we shall be led forward by our great Teacher into the interior parts of divine truth; that we may go forward in knowledge, wisdom, and experience, till we arrive in the most holy place above.—The spiritual building, which the Lord is erecting, will prove both eminent and durable: our standing in the grace of God will be firmer, and our views and hearts more enlarged, in proportion as we mount upward in our affections and conversation: and all the windings and intricacies of a Christian's path still lead him upward.—The peace and enlargement of the church, and the believer's comfort and growth in grace, commonly make progress together.—The cause of God gains ground gradually amidst all revolutions, under every dispensation: the boundaries of the church were vastly extended by the first preaching of the gospel to the Gentiles; but they will be much more enlarged, when the Jews shall be converted, and all nations shall do service to the great Redeemer.—We have fellowship with angels in our employment and felicity, in proportion as we grow devoted to the service of our God and Saviour.—Prudence, affection, and fortitude should unite with fervency, in all our services.—The ordinances of God have hitherto been rendered more simple and spiritual: the table of the Lord has succeeded to altars and sacrifices; and the worship of God "in spirit and truth," and the beauty of holiness, to the burdensome rites and costly ornaments of the old dispensation. We should therefore endeavour to grow more simple in our dependence, and in our intentions and pursuits, and more spiritual in our affections and worship; for these things evidently mark the progress of the church, and of every believer,

NOTES.

CHAP. XLII. V. 1. This is, by some commentators, supposed to describe some buildings, not before mentioned.
—"Chamber," in the singular, is thought to be used for chambers, or rows of chambers in three stories. These seem to have been situated in the inner court, (Notes, 13, 14,) perhaps just before the separate place, at the entrance from the north. (Marg. Ref. c.)

V. 2. Perhaps this means, that the north door was a hundred cubits from the entrance into the court; and the door, or gateway, or portico, was fifty cubits in length.

V. 3. "One side of these buildings looked upon the 'void space about the temple, which contained twenty 'cubits, ... (xli. 10;) and the other ... toward the pavement
'belonging to the outward court, described, xl. 17.' Lowth.
(Marg. Ref.)—There are difficulties in these delineations, which none seem hitherto to have cleared up. A reverence is due to the word of God; some instructive meaning is doubtless conveyed, which will one day be manifested: in the mean while, I would give any hints or conjectures that I can. I am, however, far from confident, that I have, in several particulars, shewn the real meaning of the vision.
But a hint, or a conjecture, may give some other person a clue, which may help to lead him through these intricacies.

V. 4. There seems to have been two rows of these chambers, and a wall between of ten cubits width; with an entrance into it from the chambers, of one cubit in width. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5, 6. 'The two upper stories had balconies, standing out of them, the breadth of which was taken out of 'the rooms themselves, and made them so much the nar'rower.' Lowth.—These were not supported by pillars, built on the outside of the walls, as was the case in some other balconies or galleries; but merely by the wall itself:

and therefore the chambers became narrower in the second story than in the first, and in the third than in the second.
It does not, however, appear, how the second story was supported, as the wall of the first story was made the basis of the balcony above it; and the wall of the second the basis of the third story. Perhaps some arch was formed for this purpose; and a slight one might suffice, as the weight to be supported towards the top of the building would be comparatively small. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.)

V. 8. And before, &c.] Passing from the north to the south side of the temple, (11, 12,) the prophet was shewn that the space of ground, which was before the temple on the east, measured a hundred cubits. (xli. 14.)

V. 9. (Marg.) 'The entry into these south chambers, 'was by a pair of stairs at the east corner of the outer
'court. xli. 19.' Lowth.

V. 10. Thickness.] 'Or rather breadth of the wall,
'that is the breadth of ground which that wall inclosed.
'xli. 12.' Lowth.

Over against.] (1. 13.) 'These south chambers had the 'same situation, with respect to the temple, as the north
'chambers had.' Ibid.

V. 11, 12. 'Such a way led to these chambers, as is 'described leading to the chambers on the north side (4):
'the proportions of both were the same; and the windows,
'doors, and passages belonging to these, were exactly uni'form with those on the north-side.' Lowth. (Notes, 4—9.)

like the appearance of the chambers which were toward the north, as long as they, and as broad as they: and all their goings out were both according to their fashions, and according to their doors.

12 And according to the doors of the chambers that were toward the south, ¹ was a door in the head of the way, even the way directly before the wall toward the east, as one entereth into them.

13 Then said he unto me, The north chambers and the south chambers which are before the separate place, ^m they be holy chambers, where the priests that ⁿ approach unto the LORD shall eat the most holy things: there shall they lay ^o the most holy things, and the meat-offering, and the sin-offering, and the trespass-offering; for the place is holy.

14 When the priests enter therein, then shall ^p they not go out of the holy place into the utter court, but there they shall lay their garments wherein they minister; for they are holy; ^q and shall put on other garments, and shall approach to those things which are for the people.

15 ¶ Now when he had made an end of ^r measuring the inner house, he brought me forth toward ^s the gate whose prospect is toward the east, and measured it round about.

17 He measured the north side five hundred reeds, with the measuring reed round about.

19 He turned about to the west side, and measured five hundred reeds, with the measuring reed.

20 He measured it by the four sides: ^v it had a wall round about, ^w five hundred reeds long, and five hundred broad, to make ^x a separation between the sanctuary, and the profane place.

V. 13. The chambers above described, (8—12,) were appropriated to the priests, that in them they might “eat the most holy things,” which must not be carried out of the precincts of the temple; and also to lay up any part of them, which was reserved for future use. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 8. 11, 12.)

V. 14. ‘They shall not go into the court of the people in their priestly vestments, but shall lay them up in some of these chambers. The priestly garments were only to be used in the time of their ministration. xlv. 19. Ex. xxviii. 43.’ Lowth. (Marg. Ref.—Note, xlv. 17—20.)

Shall approach.] Or, “Shall come into the court belonging to the people.”

V. 15—20. The temple and its out-buildings are here stated to be built on a square at least of very nearly an English mile on each side, or four miles in circuit. (Note, xl. 5.) This is far greater than either Solomon’s temple, or that after the captivity, ever was; or indeed than the mountain of the temple was capable of containing, according to the description of the Jewish writers. This shews that the vision cannot be explained of any temple, that has hitherto been built, or indeed of any literal temple; but figuratively and mystically. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, xlviii. 30—35. Rev. xxi. 9—21.)—Some learned men indeed, on the authority of the Septuagint, would substitute cubits for reeds in all these verses: but the word cubits does not once occur; whereas the word reeds is repeated four times. It is evident, that the Greek translators had Solomon’s temple in view, and changed reeds for cubits, in order to adjust the dimensions of this temple to those of Solomon’s; and that later writers have proposed the alteration in the text for the same reason. But, if men allow themselves to substitute one word for another, in the sacred text, because the alteration would render that consistent with their systems, which otherwise would be incompatible with them; there is no knowing to what lengths they may proceed. Surely it is better to acknowledge our ignorance, on such abstruse subjects, than to support a favourite scheme of interpretation, by giving countenance to so dangerous a measure!

The sanctuary. (20) ‘By “the sanctuary” is here meant the whole compass of ground, which was the precincts of the temple, elsewhere called “the holy mountain.” (xliii. 12.) In comparison of which, Jerusalem itself, though upon several accounts styled “The holy city,” was esteemed but as profane ground. xlviii. 15.’ Lowth.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The publick worship of God in his courts, the secret devotion of the closet, and the social intercourse of Christians, should all be attended to in their places; in order to produce a “conversation becoming the Gospel of Christ.”—When true religion shall diffuse its benign influence through the nations, and the churches of the saints shall be exceedingly multiplied, we may expect greater unity in judgment, worship, and practice, than there is in the present low and divided state of vital godliness.—Whilst as spiritual priests we approach to the Lord, through our glorified High Priest, feed on the sacrifice that he has offered, and appear before God clothed in his robe of spotless righteousness: we should be careful to exemplify the efficacy of our principles in the holiness of our lives. We should in every thing support the distinction between sacred and profane: the minister must not leave the sanctuary to pollute himself by sin, to involve himself in secular concerns, or to renounce his ministry. The man, that "hath put his hand to the plow, and looketh back, is not "fit for the kingdom of God:" true believers continue to the end in the ways and service of the Lord; this is their privilege, their desire, and their practice. Sacred things must not be made subservient to secular interests; but these must be subordinated to the concerns of religion, and kept distinct from them, or rendered subservient to them. However the privileges and liberty of believers may be enlarged, or the boundaries of the church extended; a separation still subsists between the righteous and the wicked, which will be manifested, and made final and eternal, in the approaching day of righteous retribution.

NOTES.

CHAP. XLIII. V. 1—5. (Marg. Ref.) 'The word, Behold, is an expression of joy and admiration: as if the prophet had said, Behold a wonderful and joyful sight! The glory of that God, who calls himself "the "God of Israel," as choosing to dwell among them, and "to give evident tokens of his presence among them, and "protection over them: this glory which had departed from "this place for so long a time, ... now returns by the same "way it departed. (x. 19.)' Lowth. (Notes, x. 18—22. xi. 22—25.)—It is not recorded, that the glory of God visibly took possession of the second temple; as it had done of the tabernacle, and afterwards of Solomon's temple, when consecrated. (Notes, Lev. ix. 22—24. 1 Kings viii. 10—14. 2 Chr. vii. 1—3.) It is therefore necessary to look beyond the return of the Jews from Babylon, and the rebuilding of the temple, for the fulfilment of these predictions. Indeed the personal presence of Immanuel, at the second temple, rendered it more glorious than that built by Solomon; (Note, Hag. ii. 5—9;) yet this part of the vision rather relates to the times, which are here supposed to be predicted in the whole of this description; namely those which shall succeed the conversion of the Jews, and their restoration to their own land.—The prophet "saw the glory "of the God of Israel" coming "from the east." Christ is "the Sun of righteousness:" and as the sun arises in the east; so did he arise in the eastern regions, and thence his light has been communicated to the western world. It is not intimated, that a dark cloud attended this visible glory, as under former dispensations; for the full light of the gospel dispels the darkness which before rested on heavenly things. It was however attended by "a voice, "like a noise of many waters;" (i. 24. Rev. i. 15;) which may denote the efficacy of the gospel in alarming and converting sinners; or the terrible denunciations of God's vengeance on all opposers of his people, whom he will overwhelm as by the roaring and vehemence of some great inundation. "The earth also shined with his glory:" (Notes, Is. vi. 1—4. Hab. iii. 3—5 :) for the light of divine truth, displaying the glory of God in Jesus Christ, shall illuminate all the nations when those times shall arrive.—The glory of God, which the prophet saw, resembled that which had before appeared to him. (Notes, i. 4—28. iii. 22—27. ix. 3, 4. x. xi. 22—25.) He had then foretold the destruction of Jerusalem with such exactness, that it might be said he "came to destroy it:" but now he predicted the Lord's return to the city, and its prosperity; and he had a renewal of the same vision, which caused him to prostrate himself in humble adoration of the divine majesty. Thus the glory of God filled the temple; and the divine Spirit brought the prophet into the inner court to witness that transaction.

V. 6. While the prophet was adoring the manifested glory of God; he was addressed by a voice out of the temple, and charged with the subsequent message. (Marg. Ref.) It is also observed, that the man, who had been his Instructor, stood by him. If this Instructor was the Messiah, as many think, then the prophet had a vision of the three persons in the sacred Trinity, manifesting in different ways their presence with him. (Notes, xl. 3. Matt. iii. 16, 17.)

in this respect, he had a throne and a footstool at his temple: (Marg. Ref. o—q:) but the people and their kings had defiled his sanctuary and his holy name, by their idolatries. (Marg. Ref. r.—Note, xx. 39.)—"The carcasses of their kings," may signify, either the idols worshipped by the kings of Judah, which were as lifeless, and as loathsome before God, as putrid carcasses; or the dead bodies of the children whom they sacrificed to their abominable idols, upon high places erected within sight of the temple. (Notes, Lev. xxvi. 30. Jer. xvi. 17, 18, v. 18.) But indeed, they had brought their images, even into the sanctuary itself: so that the thresholds and pillars of the places erected for idolatry, stood close by, or over against, the threshold, pillars, and posts of the temple: and there was but a wall between the glorious God and these his contemptible and detestable rivals. (Marg.) Thus they had so provoked him, that he consumed them in his anger. (Marg. Ref. t.—Notes, viii. 16. 1 Kings xxi. 4, 5. xxiii. 4—6.) But the Lord here engages, that this shall no more be the case: the house of Israel shall no more defile his sanctuary and his holy name, as they had done: "Now shall they," says he, "put away their whoredom and the carcasses of their kings far from me, and I will dwell in the midst of them for ever." This is the literal translation of the ninth verse. It is evidently a prediction, or a promise, and not an exhortation. And thus it exactly accords with the prophecies in many of the chapters preceding this vision. (Marg. Ref. u—y.—Notes, xxxiv. 23—31. xxxvi. 25—27. xxxvii. 23—28. xxxix. 23—29.)—After the return of the Jews from Babylon, they relapsed no more to gross idolatry: but they soon were led to prefer their own traditions and superstitions to the commandments of God; and they rejected Christ, to cleave to their own pharisaical or legal righteousness. Thus they "set their thresholds by God's threshold." The same has been more or less done by every society of Christians and their rulers: but the Lord will shortly purify his whole church from all abuses, idolatries, superstitions, false doctrines, and human inventions: and when this is done, he will come gloriously to dwell in his church for ever; on earth to the end of the world, in heaven to all eternity.

V. 10, 11. The Jews must be shewn the measure and "pattern" of the house, in order to render them ashamed of their idolatries and iniquities: and when this had produced its effect, they would be more fully informed concerning all the regulations and laws of it, which would be written before them, that they might do them.—This would remind them of what God had done for them in times past, and shew them what he had reserved for them in future; and on both accounts make them ashamed of their rebellions: it would also serve to expose their sins, and to direct their reformation. This may also refer to the times, when the whole church shall be reformed according to the standard of scripture; when all Christians shall discern, by that light, their deviations from the truth of God, in doctrine, discipline, worship, and practice; and, repenting of them, shall effectually endeavour to rectify them.—We may probably suppose, ... that 'the model of God's temple, here set forth, is but a pattern of heavenly things, as Moses's was; (Ex. xxv. 40;) and a type of that pure church, "built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ being 'the chief Corner-stone," which we may hope God will, 'in due time, every where restore. And in the mean season 'it is the duty of all good Christians, according to their 'abilities, to inform themselves and others, what is the 'pattern, form, and fashion of this true church of God, in 'order to reform all those deviations which have been made 'from it.' Lowth. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Note, xl. 2.)

V. 12. This is the law, or rule, concerning the house; that the whole area above described (Notes, xlii. 15—20,) should be most holy, and no part of it used for common purposes. (Marg. Ref.) was placed around it, as some think, to keep the blood of the sacrifices from running upon the pavement, and to confine it to the channel by which it was carried off. This was "the higher place," or ground, compared with the rest of the court, being raised one cubit above it. From this bottom to "the lower settle" was two cubits. The settles seem to have been ledges of a cubit in breadth, on each side of the altar, on which the priests might walk to perform what was needful to be done. From the lower settle to the higher was four cubits.—The lower settle, or in-benching, is called "the lesser," and the higher, "the greater:" yet it does not appear, that the higher was broader than the lower, and the extent of it must have been less; but it would be most conspicuous, on account of its height, and so more noticed. Above this upper settle the altar was raised four cubits, and on the corners four horns were fixed. The upper part of the altar was twelve cubits square; but the lower settle, measuring at the outside, was fourteen: for the two settles deducted two cubits on each side from the dimensions of the bottom.—God commanded in the law, that the priests should not ascend by stairs, or steps, to the altar: and the original here only means ascents, probably by a sloping gradual rising.—Dr. Lightfoot ... remarks, out of the Jewish writers, that within two cubits of the top, or place where the hearth was, there was another narrowing or bench of a cubit in breadth, where the priests stood to officiate.—The altar is twice mentioned ... under two different names: the first, Harel, that is the mountain of God, being so called, as some Rabbins think, in opposition to the idolatrous altars built upon high places: the second, Ariel, that is the lion of God, ... because it devoured and consumed the sacrifices.—This ascent is directed to be placed 'at the east side of the altar, that they who went up 'should look toward the west and upon the temple, and 'should turn their backs to the rising sun, in opposition 'to the rites of those idolaters who worshipped the rising 'sun. (viii. 16.)' Lowth. Perhaps by Ariel, the hearth of the altar is meant. (Marg.—Note, Is. xxix. 1, 2.)—The description of this altar materially differs from the account given of that, which was made when Solomon built the temple.—That was indeed nearly the same height as this, but it was twenty cubits square; and nothing is said about any settles or in-benchings; but the reader is led to suppose that it was as wide at the top as at the bottom: and the altar erected after the captivity was set upon its bases, probably on the very foundation of the altar made by Solomon, and of the same dimensions. (Notes, 2 Chr. iv. 1. Ezra iii. 2, 3.)—These considerations confirm the supposition, that the state of the church, or of Israel, when converted to Christ and restored to their own land, is predicted, under emblems taken from the ceremonies of the Mosaical dispensation. But, probably, the precise meaning of each particular will not be understood, till explained by the fulfilment. (Marg. Ref.—Note, Ex. xxvii. 1—8.)

and the same evangelical truths are here prophetically proposed, as were there exhibited in the way of positive injunction.—It is remarkable, that the prophet is addressed, as if he were personally to superintend the service, in the same manner that Moses did when the tabernacle was set up, and when Aaron and his sons were consecrated. Yet he was not employed at the consecration of the altar or temple, after the captivity: but probably was dead before that time.—Seed of Zadok. (19) xl. 46. Note, xlv. 10—14.—Cast salt, &c. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS

V. 1—12.

All external institutions of religion derive their excellency and efficacy from the presence and manifested glory of God in them: and, as this glory is displayed in Christ our “Sun of righteousness,” we sinners may behold it with comfort. His voice indeed is very terrible to his enemies, and at first excites great commotion and consternation in the hearts of his chosen people: but when they are taught by the Holy Spirit, they experience its power accompanied with peace and comfort to their souls.—Every display of the divine glory should inspire our hearts with reverential awe; and the condescension and multiplied visits of our gracious God should never cause us to forget our own unworthiness and vileness. He may for a time “hide his face” from his church or any of his servants, to rebuke their sins and to humble them for their good; but in due time he will return: and, as his glory irradiates the soul of him who beholds it, so it will ere long illuminate the whole earth.—It is of the infinite mercy of our God, that he reigns upon “the throne of grace” over his redeemed people, and makes his church “the place of the soles of his feet.” But if we would have the assurance and comfort of this his condescending love, we must seek his sanctifying grace; that we may no more defile his holy name, or our souls that are his temple, by our sins; or his church, by immoralities, impieties, or superstitions. For, by “setting up” “their thresholds and posts” in opposition to the Lord’s, even kings have often substituted a carcase of worthless, nay, idolatrous observances, in the place of vital and evangelical godliness. And for these things, God has abhorred the services of his professed people, and consumed them in his anger, from age to age. As, in those happy and glorious times which are approaching, every particular will be regulated and reformed according to the sacred scriptures; so we should now put away whatever has displeased God in the conduct of his people in other ages, that we may personally anticipate those times, and do what we can towards preparing for them.—The goodness of God towards us should “lead us to repentance;” and the discovery of the rule and pattern for our conduct, will shew us the necessity of it, and direct us in it; “for by the” “law is the knowledge of sin.” But when Christ crucified, and “the things that are freely given us of God” through him, are shewn to the soul by the Holy Ghost, they peculiarly fill us with shame for all our iniquities. This penitent frame of mind prepares us for fuller discoveries of the mysteries of redeeming love, and for a more distinct understanding of all the ordinances and commandments of God.—The whole of the scriptures are written and should be opened and applied, that men may perceive their sins and repent of them, and their duties and do them: that all, which belong to the church of God may be “most holy, according to the law of the house.”

V. 13—27.

We wretched sinners can no more be holy, without “the sanctification of the Spirit,” than we can be righteous, or have access to God, except through Christ, our Altar, Priest, and Oblation. We now indeed are not required to offer any atoning sacrifices; for “by one offering” “he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified;” but “the sprinkling of his blood” is incessantly requisite to us, in all our approaches to God the Father. Even his royal and chosen priesthood, who minister unto him, could not be permitted to present their “spiritual sacrifices,” where they not cleansed from guilt through his precious blood: (Notes, Heb. xiii. 15, 16. 1 Pet. ii. 4—6:) all their powers and faculties and senses need the same cleansing, before they “can serve God acceptably” in body and soul: their best services contract so much pollution from remaining sinfulness, that they can be accepted, only as sprinkled with that “blood which cleanseth from all sin.” But when they come in the appointed way to the mercy-seat, their Advocate pleads for them within the sanctuary above, and his blood is the propitiation for their sins: they themselves become living sacrifices, holy and acceptable to God through him; and being daily washed in his blood, and seasoned with the salt of his purifying grace, they “glorify” “him in body and spirit, which are his.”—All our approaches to God should be with recollection and deliberation: our hearts should be previously prepared for attending on solemn ordinances, especially for devoting ourselves to the Lord at his table: ministers should seriously prepare for entering upon their important work, and continuing stedfast and fervent in spirit that they may fulfil it: and we should all daily be preparing to meet our God in death and judgment; that we may then find his gracious acceptance, and render him our eternal Hallelujahs.

NOTES.

CHAP. XLIV. V. 1—3. ‘He brought me to ... the gate of the outer sanctuary, which looked eastward; and that gate which I had seen formerly open, (as that by which the glory of God visibly entered into the temple,) was now shut. Then said the Lord unto me, This gate shall continue shut, and no ordinary person shall ever enter by it; because the Lord God of Israel hath honoured and hallowed it, by entering in thereby.’ Bp. Hall. (Marg. Ref.—Note, xliii. 1—5.)—Some suppose, that by the prince the high priest is meant; and others the civil governor, as Zerubbabel, or Nehemiah. But as no such rules were laid down in the Mosaic law, or prescribed concerning Solomon’s temple; so there appear no traces of their having been observed under the second temple.—The prince, in many of the preceding prophecies, evidently means Christ; (Marg. Ref. d, e;) and whatever be prophetically intended, the injunction may remind us, that none can enter heaven, the true sanctuary, as Christ did; namely, by virtue of his own excellency, and his personal holiness, righteousness, and strength. He who is “the “Brightness of JEHOVAH’s glory” entered this way: but it is now shut to the whole human race; and we all must enter as sinners, by faith in his blood, and by the communication of his grace.—The prince, having entered by the portico of this gate, would there sit to eat bread before the Lord, and then return to his palace by the same way. (Marg. Ref. c, d.—Note, xlv. 8, 9.) This may signify the Saviour’s meeting his people, and communing with them in his ordinances, and especially at his table; and coming to them and returning to his heavenly palace, so to speak, by a way of his own; as the kings of the house of David did from their palace to the temple and back again. (Notes, 1 Kings x. 4, 5.) JEHOVAH, by an audible voice out of the sanctuary, is represented, as thus speaking to the prophet.

V. 4. ‘There was no door into the house on that side; but I could see the brightness of the divine glory shining through the windows.’ Lowth. (Marg. Ref.—Note, xliii. 2—5.)

V. 5, 6. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, xl. 4. xliii. 10, 11.) When the prophet had well compared the conduct of his people “with the laws of the house,” it would be evident to him, that they had been guilty of many abominations; and he was ordered to call them to repentance and reformation, and to let what was past suffice them, for they had already become exceedingly guilty. (Notes, xlv. 9. 1 Pet iv. 3—5.)

V. 7—9. ‘Setting up idols within the precincts of mine own house, and appointing idolatrous priests to uncircumcised in flesh, shall enter into my sanctuary, of any stranger that is among the children of Israel.

10 And ^xthe Levites that are gone away far from me, when Israel went astray, which went astray away from me after their idols; they shall even ^ybear their iniquity.

11 Yet they shall be ministers in my sanctuary, ^zhaving charge of the gates of the house, and ministering to the house: they ^ashall slay the burnt-offering, and the sacrifice for the people, ^band they shall stand before them to minister unto them.

12 Because ^cthey ministered unto them before their idols, and ^dcaused the house of Israel to fall into iniquity; ^etherefore have I lifted up mine hand against them, saith the Lord God, ^fand they shall bear their iniquity.

13 And ^gthey shall not come near unto me, to do the office of a priest unto me, nor to come near to any of my holy things, in the most holy place: but they shall ^hbear their shame, and their abominations which they have committed.

14 But I will make them ⁱkeepers of the charge of the house for all the service thereof, and for all that shall be done therein.

15 But the priests the Levites, ^jthe sons of Zadok, that kept the charge of my sanctuary, when the children of Israel went astray from me, they shall come near to me to minister unto me, and ^kthey shall stand before me to offer unto me ^lthe fat, and the blood, saith the Lord God:

16 They shall enter into my sanctuary, and they shall come near ^mto my table, to minister unto me, and they shall ⁿkeep my charge.

' officiate there. (xl.iii. 8.) ... Or ... they suffered the ' heathen to offer at God's altar, expressly against the law.' Lowth. The last mentioned profanation is not recorded in any instance.—The introduction of uncircumcised persons, to eat of the peace offerings and oblations, would have been a gross violation of the Mosaick law. But "the uncircumcised in heart," as well as "in flesh," are mentioned; yet there was no law to exclude unregenerate persons, who were circumcised and ritually clean, from the ordinances of the temple: so that this must denote a different constitution. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. o, p. u.—Notes, Lev. xxvi. 41, 42. Deut. x. 16. xxx. 1—10, v. 6. Jer. iv. 3, 4. ix. 25, 26. Acts vii. 51—53. Rom. ii. 25—29. Phil. iii. 1—7, v. 3. Col. ii. 11, 12.) And it seems to refer to the prostitution of the Christian sacraments, by admitting ungodly persons, who come from secular motives, to partake of them; and to the admission of such persons into the ministry, as seek nothing but the emolument or worldly distinctions of the sacred office; which things are the scandal, and threaten the ruin, of the protestant churches, as well as others. Thus God's covenant is broken, and its seals and the most sacred institutions of Christianity are prostituted, secularized, and abused; the most holy things are neglected, and keepers are placed over the charge of God in the sanctuary, to please the humours, to flatter the pride, to subserve the lusts, or support the political designs of men. All these abuses will be terminated, when this prophecy shall be fulfilled. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 10—14. Even those Levites, who were also priests as descended from Aaron, had often led the Jews into idolatry, by their example and influence; and yet in general they had been permitted to perform the most honourable parts of their sacred function: but, in the times predicted, such persons would deservedly be disgraced, and punished by degradation to the meaner and more laborious services; such as the work of porters, or slaying the sacrifices.—Few, if any, of those who before the captivity had been criminal in this respect, witnessed the restoration of the temple-service; nor does it appear that their descendants were thus degraded, on account of the idolatry of their ancestors: and after the captivity, it is not recorded, that any of the priests were guilty of leading the people to worship idols. But a thorough reformation of the whole church, or the prevalence of pure religion among the converted Jews, is evidently predicted, under allusion to the Mosaick institutions.—Thus perhaps, those ministers, who have supported antichristian idolatries and gross superstitions; or who have been heretical in their doctrines, or scandalous in their lives, may be excluded from the sacred service, and otherwise punished and disgraced, when the times here predicted shall arrive: yet being brought to repentance, they may be employed in the worship of God, and admitted to perform more ordinary services. Or, in general, effectual means will be used, to prevent the exceedingly great scandal and wide spreading mischief, of an unregenerate and ungodly ministry. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, Lev. i. 5—9. Num. viii. 19. xviii. 1—7. 2 Kings xxiii. 9. 1 Chr. xxiii. 2—28.)

V. 15, 16. Zadok was made high priest by Solomon, when Abiathar was degraded for rebellion, according to the sentence denounced against the family of Eli. (Marg. Ref. i.—Notes, 1 Sam. ii. 35, 36. 1 Kings i. 8—10. 39. ii. 26, 27. 35.) Zadok signifies righteous: and it is probable that his posterity in general supported the worship of JEHOVAH, when the other priests went astray from him; and therefore the priesthood was to be established among them, and they would be honoured by exclusively performing those services, in which the priests had the nearest access to God. In this prophecy, they represent faithful, holy, and conscientious ministers of Christ: and it is here predicted under this allusion, that such ministers shall greatly abound, and be encouraged in the happy period intended.—It is observable, that the table in the sanctuary is mentioned rather than the altar of incense; perhaps intimating the change in the external institutions of divine worship, which would take place before the accomplishment of the prophecy. It is not easy to determine, whether any external regulations, in respect of divine ordinances, answering to these predictions, will be made among the converted Jews, when reinstated in their own land, or not. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 17—20. The garments of the priests, as appointed in the law, are here referred to, though with some variations. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. o—q.—Notes, Ex. xxviii. 40—43.)—The prescribed attire may denote, that every thing should be so devised, as to render Christians and ministers most unencumbered, and prepared for their work; and that they should “abstain from all appearance of evil,” and whatever may prove offensive and disgusting in their deportment and ministrations. The putting off their garments, that they might not “sanctify the people with” them, may prophetically refer to the superstitions in use among papists and others, who suppose a sanctifying efficacy inherent in the garments or relicks of holy men. ‘They shall not tie them to an expectation of sanctity to be derived from them.’ Bp. Hall. (Marg. Ref. r, s.) All these superstitions will be at length abolished; and yet a decent distinction will be preserved between things sacred and common. (Note, xlii. 14.) The way also, in which the priests were directed to wear their hair, in the medium between opposite extremes, might denote the attention, that should be paid to gravity and decorum in their external appearance, as well as the simplicity and spirituality of their hearts. (Marg. Ref. t, u.)—And within. (i7) That is, in the temple itself.

V. 21. Marg. Ref.—Note, Lev. x. 8—11.

V. 22. According to the law, the high priest was not allowed to marry either a widow, or a divorced person: but here, all the priests are forbidden to marry any widow, except the widow of a priest. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, Lev. xxi. 7. 10—15, vv. 13—15.) This regulation plainly intimates the superior sanctity of the times referred to. There is no reason, however, to induce us to a literal interpretation of this regulation, as if binding on Christian ministers, any more than for such an interpretation of the other rules of this vision: it only implies, that in the predicted period, they would avoid all scandalous or suspicious connexions, and every thing that could lessen their characters among the people, or discredit their sacred office.—It is observable, that marriage is always considered as consistent with the most sacred characters, and in the most holy persons, under every dispensation of the church, and even in its highest state of earthly purity.

V. 23, 24. (Marg. Ref. z.—Notes, xxii. Lev. x. 8—11. 26. Deut. xxxiii. 10. Mal. ii. 4—9.)—The priests and Levites under the Mosaick dispensation frequently acted as magistrates. (Marg. Ref. a.—Notes, Deut. xvii. 8—13. 1 Chr. xxiii. 2—6, v. 4. xxvi. 29—32. 2 Chr. xix. 5—14.) In allusion to which, it is perhaps here intimated, that controversies will, in the times predicted, be generally decided by arbitration; by reference to ministers and according to the law of God; and not by litigations before human tribunals, according to the laws of man (5). (Notes and P. O. Acts vi. 1—7. Note, 1 Cor. vi. 1—6.)—The particular mention of hallowing the sabbath, in this emblematical prophecy of a future prosperous state of religion; implies the importance, as well as the perpetual obligation, of that sacred institution: when true piety most prevails, it will be most honoured by ministers and people. (Marg. Ref. b, c.—Notes, Is. lvi. 5—7. lviii. 13, 14.)

V. 25—27. ‘Whosoever touched a dead body became legally unclean: (Num. xix. 11:) and thereby was unqualified to attend upon God’s worship in the temple.

Num. xix. 11. 21.)—Even when those additional days were expired, he must recommence his ministrations by offering a sin-offering. (Marg. Ref. g.—Notes, Ex. xxix. 10—14. Lev. iv.) The superiority of Christian ministers, in the approaching happy period, over their natural affections, is here denoted, with reference to the law of Moses: they are supposed to mourn for their near relations; but they are represented as moderating their grief, and not long permitting it to interrupt them in their important work: yet still even in this respect needing forgiveness, through Christ our sin-offering.

V. 28—30. The portion, both of the land, and of its increase, which were presented as a holy oblation to God, were by him given to the priests for their maintenance. Thus they would have no inheritance, distinct from the portion which God reserved for himself. They would be maintained, so to speak, at his table; and would forfeit their support, if his worship should be forsaken. What particular regulations, concerning the provision for ministers in the predicted times, are thus foretold, the event must determine: certainly important alterations are needful in that respect. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16.

No man should presume, even in appearance, to arrogate to himself that glory which belongs to God alone. It is also very proper that Christ our Prince should “in all things have the pre-eminence:” but though the way, by which he has entered into heaven, is for ever shut against the whole fallen race of Adam; yet he has opened for us “a new and living way,” by which we may find access and acceptance, through faith in his blood. He also graciously comes among his assembled people, to commune with them, before they go to be with him in heaven. Then the glory of the Lord fills his sanctuary, and his people adore him with humble gratitude: and we should carefully meditate on these goings of our God and King, and hearken to all that he says to us, concerning “the ordinances and laws of his house;” and we should mark well the entrance into his courts, and all the goings out of them. Thus we shall be able to see, how rebelliously even professed Christians have prostituted his sacraments, and the sacred ministry, by throwing them open to strangers, enemies, and evidently unregenerate persons; to the disgrace of the gospel, the grief of true believers, and the encouragement of wicked men. Alas! they, to whom these charges have been committed, have not kept them: but have profaned them for secular interest or carnal affection; to feed hungry relatives, or to enrich or humour ungodly connexions. Or men have heaped to themselves flattering teachers after their own lusts, or they have made the seals of God’s covenant the passport to preferment! These are gross violations of the covenant, and great abominations, of which it should “suffice all the parties concerned.” (P. O. Rev. xviii. 9—19.) They have always been the ruin of vital godliness, in proportion as they have prevailed; and indeed they prevail almost universally. But, whatever men may connive at or determine, the Lord will certainly exclude all such as are “uncircumcised in heart;” and, though they may enter into the outward sanctuary, they shall find no admission into heaven.—Those professed ministers of religion, who forsake God, and lead the people astray into idolatry, superstition, heresy, or wickedness, shall even bear their iniquity: and when they who sustain this sacred character fall into scandalous sins, they should not be hasty in returning to their publick work: for even if they repent, and again serve God and enjoy communion with him, and be in some respects employed by him; yet they may not be able to recover their influence or to be useful as before: and if they be degraded, and bear their shame, for an example to others; they should not complain, but be thankful for acceptance in the meanest place or most laborious services. But such as indeed keep the charge of the sanc-

All who are employed in the important work of the ministry, should be of harmless and blameless conversation; sound in the faith, full of good works; of exemplary temperance, sobriety, and gravity; walking humbly before God, and circumspectly in the sight of men: not arrogating honour to themselves, or leading the people into a superstitious veneration of them; yet acting honourably, and maintaining a sober peculiarity in their whole conduct. They should perform the most common actions of life, in pious and sanctified manner; their apparel, and the whole of their style of living, should be plain, simple, frugal, and such as manifests their indifference about worldly things: they should be careful in forming connections, and in the choice of wives, and prudent in the management of their families; shewing that they are governed by reason, conscience, and the fear of God, not by passion and humour, in all these matters. They should teach the people, both by word and example, the difference between the holy and profane, the clean and the unclean: they should study to be peace-makers, and should regulate their judgment and decisions in all cases by the commandments of God; and not according to their own humours, interests, or partialities: they should observe, and teach others to observe, the statutes of the Lord, in all the ordinances of his house, and in hallowing his sabbaths: they should govern their passions and moderate their sorrows, by stricter rules than they expect others to do; not suffering their work to be interrupted, or improperly performed, whenever they can help it. They should delight in every part of their sacred services; and yet do all in a humble reliance on Christ our Sin-offering, and his precious blood and prevailing intercession: and they should be superior to all avarice and sensuality. The Lord himself is the Portion of such ministers; and they need not be anxious respecting a temporal subsistence, though they have no possession in Israel. Their God will incline his servants to perform their bounden duty, by supplying their wants: and thus he will cause his blessing to rest on the houses of their benefactors, in answer to their prayers for them. So that they will not generally be obliged to involve themselves in worldly cares and employments for a maintenance: much less will they be driven to do any thing sinful or scandalous through urgent necessity: but, trusting in God and doing his will, they shall be provided for, as it is good for them; and “having food and raiment, they will learn to be therewith content.” Lord, increase the number of such faithful and exemplary ministers; and enlarge and prosper the spiritual priesthood, all over the whole earth!

NOTES.

CHAP. XLV. V. 1—8. The division of the land, appointed in these verses and in the forty-eighth chapter, entirely differs from that which took place in the days of Joshua; and nothing, at all answerable to it, seems to have occurred when the Jews returned from Babylon: but whether it will be, in any measure, literally fulfilled at their future restoration to their own land; or whether it figuratively describe the regulations which shall at length

take place in the affairs of the church, cannot be positively determined. It seems evident, that our translators did right in adding the word reeds, to the numbers mentioned in this admeasurement; referring to the reed, that was in the hand of Ezekiel's divine conductor, which was about four yards long; for the length and breadth of the sanctuary are stated the same as before. (Notes, xl. 5. xlii. 15—20.) So that, unless the text be there totally changed, without any authority; this passage, as well as that, must be understood of "reeds." Except when the suburbs are mentioned, the word cubit does not once occur in either place (2).—'According to this measure,' (of cubits,) 'the portion here set out will be almost seven miles square; whereas, if we measure by reeds, it will arise to six times as much, and can only be understood in a mystical sense.' Lowth.—This surely is not a sufficient reason for altering the original text: for a great part of the vision, on any supposition, must be thus interpreted. There are, however, on the other hand, those who make these measures immensely larger: but I can neither understand their rules of computation, nor the grounds on which they proceed.—It is indeed evident, that the land of Canaan could by no means admit of so large a proportion being allotted to the sanctuary, with the priests and Levites: but, it is probable this was intended to intimate the immensely large extent of the Christian church, above that of Israel; especially in those glorious times which are doubtless emblematically predicted.—Supposing, therefore, that reeds are intended, this holy oblation would, on the lowest computation, constitute a square of above forty miles on every side. From the north part of this square, a portion, of about sixteen miles in width, and above forty in length, is appointed for the priests, for their houses and possessions: but in the midst of this portion, the area of the sanctuary, about a mile square, was to be inclosed by a wall. (Note, xlii. 15—20.) This was to be "a place for their houses:" for no cities, in other parts of the land, either for priests or Levites, as under the law, are mentioned. Next to this, on the south, the other Levites were to receive their portion, of the same dimensions with that of the priests and the sanctuary. And south of this, the portion for the city was to be marked out, of the same length as the portions allotted to the priests and Levites, but only half the width. These three portions constitute the square of twenty-five thousand reeds: and that set apart for the Prince (the breadth of which is not mentioned,) extended in length, equal to the breadth of the before-mentioned portions; from north to south, on both the east and the west sides of the square. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, xlviii. 8—22.) In the predicted period, the worship and ministers of God will be liberally and conveniently provided for: the princes will be both able and willing to defray the expenses of government, without oppressing their subjects; and will rule over them with equity and clemency, as the vicegerents of Christ; and the people will submit to them conscientiously, and live in peace, prosperity, and godliness. These things seem to be represented, in language taken from the customs of the times in which the prophet wrote.—Tithes are not mentioned, either here, or in any part of the vision; which shews that in the times predicted, the ritual law of Moses will not be in force.

The homer was about ten bushels, which amounts to about eighty gallons in liquid things. ...The dividing the maneh into twenty, twenty-five, and fifteen shekels, supposes there were coins of these several values, which taken all together were to be of the same weight with the maneh.' Lowth. This is not very probable: as such coins would weigh almost a pound troy. Perhaps some methods of computation then in use, but unknown at present, are referred to. (*Marg. V. 14, 15. The oblation of the sixtieth part of the wheat, barley, and oil, and of one lamb out of two hundred, may be considered as the stock for the daily sacrifices, and the fund from which the ordinary expenses of the sanctuary were to be defrayed.—The word rendered reconciliation signifies atonement, or expiation; that which "covereth," or blotteth out, the guilt of sin. This regulation entirely differs from the requirements in the Mosaick ritual. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Tables.)

V. 16. 'The prince shall join with the people in 'making these oblations; whereas those that follow in 'the next verse, are to be at the sole charge of the prince.' Lowth. (Marg.)

V. 17. If Christ be meant by the Prince, as some think, this signifies, that he alone is the atoning Sacrifice for the sins of his people: and whatever oblations they present, or whatever services they acceptably perform, must be offered in his name. Yet it is far from clear, that Christ is meant by "the prince." (Notes, 18—25. xlv. 1—7. 16—18.)—The feasts here specified were typical of Christ and his salvation, and represented the sacred seasons and instituted ordinances in the church, by which they are commemorated, and the blessings of them applied to the soul; especially the preaching of the gospel, the Lord's day, and the Lord's supper. The difference between these regulations and the ceremonial law, may intimate a change in the external constitution of the church. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.)

V. 18—25. 'The words are directed to the prince. ... 'The prince was to provide the sacrifices, and the priest 'was to offer them.' Lowth. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Ex. xxix. 38—41. Lev. xvi. 11—19. xxiii. Num. xv. xxviii. xxix. Deut. xvi.) The variations from the Mosaick law, in the number of the several sacrifices, and the proportion of the meat-offering to each, being ten times as much as the law prescribed; with several other circumstances, seem more like enacting a new ceremonial law, than enforcing that of Moses. It must then be understood emblematically. "The prince" is never mentioned in the ritual appointments of Moses: but here he is required to provide the oblations. Does not this statement of what shall take place in the millennium (for that must be intended,) imply, that in those happy days, kings and rulers will take a more leading and active and liberal part, in supporting the worship of God, according to the gospel, than many at present think they ought to do? PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We should present to the Lord an oblation, of the first and best of all our possessions; that we may honour him with our substance, and obtain his blessing on all our labours and comforts.—It is the duty of Christians, according to their ability, to provide for the decent and comfortable subsistence of ministers, that they may attend to their work without distraction. But it becomes ministers to be content even with a scanty provision, and to “suffer all things rather than hinder the gospel of Christ.” The interests of religion require that they should generally reside near their work, and as retired as may be from the vain hurry of the world: that they may “give themselves to the word of God and prayer;” and that every thing pertaining to them may savour of holiness and piety.—Subjects also should willingly contribute what is requisite to the honourable support of their governors, and the charges of government: and princes, especially “the princes of Israel,” ought to imitate the equity and lenity of Christ our King: they should use their authority for the good of the people, and lay no needless or oppressive burdens on them; that they may comfortably enjoy their possessions. If any have deviated (as alas! too many have, and still do,) from these salutary rules; they must be warned to proceed no further, but to let the past iniquity suffice; to remove all violence and spoil, and to terminate all exactions. These are the duties of men in every age: and the happy time is coming, when all ranks in every part of the earth will attend to them. Then there will be no more fraud, oppression, misery, war, or devastation; but universal righteousness, peace, and prosperity. (Note, Rev. xx. 1—6.)—It is an important part of the will of God, that men should deal with exact honesty in all the transactions of life: no zeal, orthodoxy, or diligence in religion can compensate for the want of truth and justice in our moral conduct; though for a time they may cloke it. The Lord requires a just weight, and a true balance, and exactness in every one of our dealings.—All should use their influence, and improve their talents, in promoting the cause of godliness. The sabbaths and ordinances of God, and the commemoration of his benefits, should be our chief delight and satisfaction: and we should aim to reduce our various duties to some regular method, that they may not interfere with each other; and to persist in it till it become habitual. And, though nothing we do can atone for sin; our zealous services testify our acceptance of the sacrifice of Christ our Prince and High Priest, which according to his part, he has most graciously prepared for us, and to which we must have continual respect in all our approaches to God. For our very best duties are polluted with sin; we pollute the ordinances in which we join, and all that we are connected with, till they are cleansed in the fountain of his blood: and our errors, ignorance, and simplicity, as well as our wilful sins, need the same cleansing. But his oblation of himself once offered is of infinite sufficiency, and answers these and all other purposes of mercy to the whole multitude of believers, in every age and nation: and it would equally suffice for the whole human species, were they made willing to come to God by him, who by “one offering hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified.” As therefore “Christ our Passover is sacrificed for us; let us keep the “feast” of faith and communion with him, not with the old leaven of malice and wickedness, but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth: (Note, 1 Cor. v. 6—8:) let us begin our years, our months, our weeks, and days, with self-examination, repentance, faith, prayer, and devotedness to God; and spend them in the same manner. Let us live like strangers and pilgrims on earth, rejoicing in Christ, as we pass through this desert to heaven: and then we shall soon arrive in those mansions above, “where is “fulness of joy, and pleasures at God’s right hand for “evermore.”

NOTES.

CHAP. XLVI. V. 1—3. The prophet had before observed, that “the way of the gate of the outward sanctuary, which looketh toward the east, ... was shut;” and had been informed, that it must not be opened, but for the prince. (Note, xlv. 1—3.) But “the gate of the “inner court” on the east is here spoken of. This was to be shut on other days, but to be opened on the sabbaths and new moons, until the evening. According to this, it seems, that none were at any time to come into the sanctuary by the east gate of the outward court, except the prince: and that the priests and Levites must go into the inner court by the north or south gates, except on the sabbaths and new moons: when, entering the outward court by the north or south gates, perhaps they might pass into the inner court by the east-gate: or they must open it, that the prince might enter, and that the people might worship before it, with the altar and sacrifices full in view. —‘The prince only shall enter by the way of that gate; and when he is to enter, shall stand at the post of that gate, until the priest have prepared his burnt-offering and peace-offering; and...when they have made this safe way for him, he shall come in, having first bowed down, and worshipped at the threshold of the gate. Likewise the people...shall worship at the door of this gate, but they shall not presume to enter by it.’ Bp. Hall. This seems to denote the constant, reverential, and exemplary attendance of kings on the pure, evangelical ordinances of religion, in the approaching flourishing days of the church. Some indeed interpret it of Christ’s meeting his assembled people on their solemn festivals, especially on his own day, to apply to them the benefits of his atonement and prevailing mediation: but, he does not meet his people as joining in their worship, or as offering any sacrifice: so that this interpretation appears to be inadmissible. (Marg Ref.)

(2) Note, xl. 9.—Prepare, &c.] Or, “offer” it: for so the word often means.—The people, &c. (3) The gate on the sabbaths and new moons was not to be shut till evening; which implied, that those days should be wholly employed in religious exercises: whereas on other days men might attend as they had leisure, and then return to their ordinary employments. V. 4—7. ‘This was a new ordinance; whereupon the number of the beasts, and the proportions of the meat and drink-offerings, are different here from those prescribed in the law.’ Lowth. (Marg. Ref. h, i.)—The meat-offering under the law, was only three-tenth deals; or

V. 8, 9. None but the prince might enter the sanctuary from the east, and there was no entrance from the west; so that all the people must enter from the north, or from the south. (Note, 1—3.) But those who entered from the north were to go out by the south; and they who entered by the south, to go out by the north. This may signify, that every thing should be regulated, in respect of divine worship, in that way which may most effectually prevent disorder and interruption: but it is generally supposed to intimate that men should go forward, and make progress in religion, and go through with it; and not be superficial, hypocritical, or apostate.—‘There being no passage or thoroughfare out of the temple westward; if the people had entered in at the east gate, they must have returned back the same way they came in; which would have been turning their back upon God and the place of his residence.’ Lowth.—As the prince was to return by the east-gate, this reason is scarcely conclusive. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 10. Though the prince was directed to enter and return by a way of his own; yet he might enter the sanctuary at the same time, and continue as long there as the people; and thus testify his fellowship with them in the worship of God.—‘He shall pay the same attendance upon God’s worship with the people; since all men are equal in the sight of God.’ Lowth. (*Marg. V. 13—15. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, Ex. xxix. 38—41. Num. xxviii. 3—10.) It is observable, that nothing is here said about "the evening-sacrifice;" or the additional lamb, morning and evening, on "the sabbath-days." Many suppose the evening-sacrifice to be included: but as "the morning" is repeated in a remarkable manner, and the evening is not once mentioned; it seems rather to be an intimation of that change in the externals of religion, which the coming of Christ would introduce.

V. 16—18. This may signify, that princes in those days will not waste their revenues in enriching favourites and dependents. The prince might settle a perpetual inheritance on his sons; but the grant made to any servant would expire at the year of jubilee.—Some think, that this implies, that Christ our Prince gives his children, or true believers, their inheritance unalienably: but those whom he only endues with gifts and talents, and employs in some part of his service, whilst they remain unregenerate, will be deprived of all, when true Christians receive the full possession of their inheritance. And in this case, the eighteenth verse may be considered as descriptive of the character and government of our Prince of Peace. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 19—24. 'The flesh of the sacrifices, which were to be eaten, was to be boiled, except the flesh of the passover. (2 Chr. xxxv. 13.) So it is taken notice of as a piece of daintiness ... in the sons of Eli, that they would not have the flesh which came to their share sodden, but roasted. (1 Sam. ii. 15.) ... The Hebrew word Keturoh, translated joined, is rendered in the margin, made with chimneys, which sense very well agrees with the description. ... There was a place in the inner court for boiling the trespass and sin-offerings; (19, 20;) and boiling places might be appointed for boiling the peace-offerings, which ... perhaps were dressed by the Levites; ... whereas the former were boiled by the priests in the court properly belonging to them.' Lowth.—'About the walls of these little courts, which were as kitchens, were little cham-

The prophet is shewn waters springing from under the threshold of the temple, growing wider and deeper, and at length becoming an impassable river, which healed the desert, and the dead sea; abounded with fish; and had on each bank fruit-trees filled with new

(Marg. and Marg Ref.)—The most holy things, of which none but the priests might eat, were to be prepared in the inner court: the peace-offerings, of which the people partook, were to be boiled in these little courts, at the corners of the outward court. The direction, "not to bear the most holy things out into the utter court, to sanctify the people," may intimate, that the peculiar privileges of believers are not granted, or left open to unconverted persons; and that they should not promiscuously be admitted to partake of the Lord's supper: as this tends to induce in them an opinion, that they are holy persons, and need not conversion; and thus occasions much superstition and delusion. (Note, xlv. 17—20, v. 19.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—15.

We should worship and commune with God every day, in our closets and families, and in publick as we have time and opportunity. On six days of the week indeed, men are called to serve God in their temporal employments; and must not neglect those duties, even for the sake of spending all their time in his more immediate worship. But on his own day we all should occupy ourselves wholly in his sacred service: and, laying aside every other employment and all avocations, as much as may be, and shaking off sloth and inactivity, we must learn to delight in the succession of one religious exercise to another, as the proper business of the whole day: and it may be right occasionally to appropriate a day from the other six, to be spent in a similar manner.—It behoves those in authority to use their influence and example, in promoting a general regard to the worship of God, and their wealth in preparing every thing for it; they should frequent his holy ordinances with reverence and attention, and without betraying any symptoms of weariness: for, however they may be distinguished in other matters from their subjects, they are in the sight of God entirely upon a level with them; and every distinction admissible respecting his worship, between them and others, must be confined merely to external circumstances. But whether rulers will or will not join with us, in attending on the lively ordinances, in which "Christ is set forth as evidently crucified among us;" he, our Prince of Peace, will surely manifest his presence amidst us: and especially when we spend his holy day with his assembled saints, and feed by humble faith on the Sacrifice, which he has prepared and offered for us. In expectation and assurances of his glorious and gracious presence, we should worship with reverence in his courts; abound in spiritual sacrifices; consecrate our talents and substance to him, according to our ability; and take care that every thing be done decently and in order. We should recollect, that Press forward is the Christian's motto: we must still depart further and further from our sins, and sinful pursuits and connexions; and get further into the fruit every month, the leaves of which served for medicine, 1—12. The borders of the land appointed, as to be divided among Israelites and sojourners, 13—23.

knowledge, practice, and experience of the gospel; and we should dread a hypocritical profession and worship, which generally terminate in a man's returning into his old course of sin and death.—The Lord has prescribed us many duties, as of indispensable obligation: but he has also graciously left many things to our voluntary choice, especially as to the proportion of our time and substance, to be appropriated to his immediate worship and service: that they, who "greatly delight in his commandments," may abound in them to his glory, the edification of their brethren, and their own benefit; without entangling their own consciences, or prescribing rules that might be inexpedient to others; or inducing them to formal services, for which they have no heart, and in which God could have no pleasure. But we must never omit our daily worship, nor neglect to apply the sacrifice of the Lamb of God to our souls, for pardon. peace, and salvation.

Our King of peace and righteousness will enrich all his spiritual progeny with an unalienable inheritance: nor will he let any man in any way serve him, without allotting him a suitable reward. But it will be dreadful to be put off with a revocable portion, and to be left utterly destitute, when the children shall receive their full liberty and eternal inheritance: let us then rest in nothing short of regenerating grace, and the Spirit of adoption witnessing with our spirits, that we are children and heirs of God.—If all princes had in them the mind that was in Christ; their peaceable subjects would never have cause to complain of being thrust out of their possessions, or scattered from them; in order that favourites and dependents might be enriched with the spoil. They would rather straiten themselves to relieve the people; as "knowing the grace of Christ, who, though he was rich, for our sakes became poor, that we through his poverty might be rich."—The minister of the gospel is as truly serving Christ and the people, when in his study he is searching the scriptures, meditating, and preparing for his work, as when he is publicly preaching the word to the congregation. He should endeavour to get well acquainted with his instructions, and to speak from a matured judgment, and an experienced heart, and with fervency of spirit: he should be careful, both in dispensing the word, and in administering the sacraments, to guard the people against superstition and false confidence, and from mistaking the notion or form for "the power of godliness:" and every thing, in his outward accommodations, and manner of life, and his method of spending his time, should be so regulated, as may best tend to make him "approved unto God, a workman that needeth not be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth."

CHAP. XLVII. V. 1—5. This part of the vision must

^e Luke xxiv. 49. Acts ii. 1. 33. x. 45, 46. xi. 16—18. * Heb. of the ancles. 4 Again he measured a thousand, and brought me through the waters; ^f the waters were to the knees. Again he measured a thousand, and brought me through; the waters were to the loins.

5 Afterward he measured a thousand; and it was a river that I could not pass over: for the waters were risen, ^g waters ^g to swim in, a river that could not be passed over.

6 And he said unto me, Son of man, ^h hast thou seen this? Then he brought me, and caused me to return to the brink of the river.

7 Now when I had returned, behold, at the ⁱ bank of the river were very many trees on the one side, and on the other.

8 Then said he unto me, These waters issue out toward the east country, ^k and go down into the ^k desert, and go into the sea; which being brought forth into the sea, ^l the waters shall be healed.

9 And it shall come to pass that every thing that liveth, which moveth, whithersoever the ^m rivers shall come, ^m shall live: and there shall be ⁿ a very great multitude of fish, because these waters shall come thither; for they shall be healed: and every thing shall live whither the river cometh.

10 And it shall come to pass, that be understood figuratively; which is important, in forming a determination concerning the import of the whole vision.—Doubtless both Solomon's temple and the second temple were well supplied with water, conveyed thither in order to wash the sacrifices, and for similar purposes; and to preserve every thing clean and wholesome: but these waters flowed originally from the temple, not as a common sewer, but as a delightful fertilizing river. The prophet had before surveyed the doors of the house: but he now for the first time discovered a very small stream of waters, (so the word signifies,) springing forth from under the threshold of the house eastward, at his right hand, and at the south-side of the altar. These waters no doubt were an emblem of the "gospel preached with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven" to render it effectual; and conveying with it all spiritual blessings to the souls of believers, and to the nations of the earth. (Marg. Ref. b.—Note, Rev. xxii. 1.)—"The gradual rise of the waters represented in this vision, denotes the large effusion of the Spirit, which was very remarkable at the first publication of the gospel, and its wonderful increase from small beginnings; and will be so again, when God shall "pour the Spirit of grace" upon the Jews, in order to their conversion. (Zech. xii. 10.) ... The supplies of grace are often represented, in the holy writers, under the metaphor of a river, and streams watering the dry and thirsty earth, both cleansing and making fruitful the ground where they pass. The metaphor is probably taken from the river that watered paradise.' Lowth. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. c—f.—Note, Gen. ii. 10—14.)—When the prophet had been shewn the source of these waters, he was led by his conductor to observe the progress and increase of them: and, as the east-gate was shut, he was brought out from the temple northward.—When his conductor, with the line in his hand, had measured the length of a thousand cubits from the source, he led the prophet across the waters, which only reached to his ancles: but continuing to try their depth every thousand cubits, he found them grow still deeper every time, till they could no longer be forded, but were become a river impassable, except by swimming.—This was an emblem of the progress of Christianity, from small beginnings to an immense increase: and the latter part of the representation may relate to the times, when the gospel shall fill the earth, and produce the most extensive and important good effects on the state of mankind in every nation.—Thus the river signifies the same as the "stone, cut out without hands, and becoming a great mountain and filling the whole earth;" and the grain of mustard seed becoming a large plant, like a tree in which the fowls of the air make their nests. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. g.—Notes, Is. ii. 2—5. ix. 5, 6. Dan. ii. 34, 35. 44, 45. Matt. xiii. 31, 32.) The passage may also be accommodated to the progressive growth in knowledge and holiness of true Christians: and it is often applied to the holy scriptures, in which are some things plain to the meanest capacity, and others incomprehensible to the most exalted created understanding; and only to be apprehended by faith, as a river that cannot be forded.

sea, or the lake of Sodom, that lay east of Jerusalem. In this sea it is said no living creature is found; at least it is evident, that it does not abound with fish, as other seas do. But the prophet was informed by his conductor, that when the waters from the sanctuary should enter the sea, its waters also would become wholesome, and fit for the production and habitation of fishes, and of every living thing found in other seas; for to every place whither they flowed they would communicate life abundantly: so that fishers would spread their nets from one side of this lake of Sodom to another, (for En-gedi lay on one side, and En-eglaim on the other side, of the lake,) and take exceedingly great quantities of all those kinds of fish, which they had been used to catch in the Mediterranean sea. 'Mystically denoting the healing virtue of God's grace to cure 'the vices and corruptions of wicked men.' Lowth.—This represented the efficacy of the gospel, when attended by the pouring out of the holy Spirit, to communicate spiritual life to the most atrocious sinners, like those of Sodom; to render the Gentile nations productive of numerous converts; checking the progress of iniquity, undermining the foundations of idolatry, reforming cities and countries, and bringing men to know, worship, and serve the one living and true God, where his name had not before been known. So that the ministers of Christ would meet with abundant encouragement to labour, and to preach the gospel, where before none ever thought of being so employed: till at length the most hopeless and benighted nations would be abundantly filled with the light and holiness of true religion. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Joel iii. 18-21, v. 18. Matt. iv. 18-22, v. 19. xiii. 47-50. Luke v. 1-11, v. 10.)

The rivers, &c. (9) 'The word "rivers and river," are promiscuously used in this verse: though some of the Jewish writers are of opinion, that these waters divide themselves, and some flow eastward, and others westward; which opinion they ground...chiefly upon the words of Zechariah. xiv. 8.' Lowth. (Note, Zech. xiv. 9, v. 8.) The dual (marg.) seems to mark out two rivers; but as the word rendered "country" (8) is Galilee, perhaps implies that one river flowed into the sea of Galilee, though that which flowed into the dead sea be principally noticed.

V. 11. There would, however, still remain some marshes, creeks, or swamps, into which these healing waters could not find an entrance; and these would be left intractably sterile and worthless. This represents the case of those, who reject, neglect, or pervert the gospel; or those countries, which exclude it from among them. In short it is the only healing medicine for the distempers of our fallen race; and they will be given up as reprobate to final ruin who are not healed by it. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, Heb. vi. 4-8. 2 Pet. ii. 20-22.)

V. 12. St. John has almost transcribed this part of the vision, and applied it to the salvation of Christ, as perfected in the felicity of heaven. (Note, Rev. xxii. 2-5, v. 2.) In his vision, the trees, on each side of the river of the water of Life, seem to signify the several parts of the mediatorial work of Christ, and the sufficiency of his salvation to supply all the various wants of believers, and to complete their uninterrupted felicity. Many expositors interpret this verse of believers, who are "trees of righteousness" planted on the banks of this river in great abundance. Yet the plenteous provisions of the gospel, the precious promises of the sacred word, and the privileges of believers, as communicated to their souls by the quickening Spirit, may be aptly thus represented. These abound on each side of the river, wherever the gospel is successfully preached: they afford nourishment and delight to the souls of men; they never fade or wither, or are exhausted; they are various, according to the variety of circumstances and occasions, in the Christian's experience; as if a tree should yield a succession of different kinds of fruit in great abundance, through the months of the year: and even the leaves serve as medicines to their souls; the warnings and reproofs of the word, and the salutary corrections of their Father's rod, though generally less valued, and always less pleasant, than divine consolations, yet tend to heal the maladies of their souls, and to restore them to holiness and happiness. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, Gen. ii. 8, 9. iii. 22-24. Prov. iii. 18. Rev. ii. 6 7.)—If believers are intended by these trees, the emblem shews that they are rendered flourishing and fruitful by the word and Spirit of God; that they become exceedingly useful; that they persevere in their fruitfulness and usefulness through the various changes of life; that they exercise various Christian graces in succession; and that their profession, doctrine, example, conversation, and endeavours, powerfully tend to instruct, reform, and benefit mankind. Several names are here added, or changed for others: yet the boundaries of the land are nearly the same as were marked out by Moses; except, that it does not appear, whether any part, or what part, of the country east of Jordan, is included within the eastern boundary. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The more carefully we examine the things of God and religion, the more interesting will be our discoveries concerning them.—All our invaluable privileges and advantages are conveyed to us through the gospel; they flow from Christ, our Temple, Altar, and Door of access to the Father; they all spring from the everlasting love and mercy of our God, through his atoning sacrifice, and by the sanctification of the Holy Spirit. No obstructions of men, or fallen angels, can interrupt the communication of spiritual blessings from the fulness of Christ to the souls of his beloved people: and the course of the greatest rivers might far more easily be stopped, than the progress of his gospel, when God is pleased to prosper the labours of his servants. It has hitherto continued gradually to diffuse its influence; and it will still run wider and deeper in its energy and effects, till it shall fill, heal, and fructify the whole earth. We may rejoice in the assured hope of this happy event: and in the mean time we may be satisfied, that the water, which Christ gives his praying people, shall be “in them a well of water springing up into everlasting life.”—Whilst we wait for the completion of our felicity, and are conflicting with various trials and temptations; let us attend to the sacred scriptures, beginning with the most obvious and practical truths, and proceeding gradually to those which are the most difficult; remembering that many things will be found incomprehensible to us, which we must apprehend by faith and humbly adore, but not presume to think that we can fathom, or judge of by our limited powers, or our proud reasonings. But we should chiefly mark the blessed effects, which the word and Spirit of God are every where represented as producing on the souls of men; that we may enquire whether they have wrought such a change in our judgment and affections, and character? Into whatever place, or heart of man, these healing waters flow, they communicate divine life and holiness; they counteract the various evil propensities of our fallen nature, and teach men to “deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world.” So that where they abound, knowledge, purity, piety, and equity, and every thing good and useful, abound likewise. How desirable then is it to be instrumental in sending the word of God to those regions, which have hitherto been given up to idolatry, ignorance, impiety, and vice! and to see the preachers of the gospel encouraged to cast their nets, and to attend to their laborious work with patient hope and evident success, where sin and Satan before reigned with undisturbed sway! The time is coming when they shall thus labour and prosper, in those distant regions, which are now enveloped in Pagan or Mohammedan darkness, with as much encouragement, as the apostles did at Jerusalem, when numbers were “daily added to the church” of such as should be saved: and their converts shall be of the same excellent character as those were, “when great grace was upon them all.” Yet is this blessed gospel of salvation the savour of death to numbers in every age: and those who are not made holy by it, because they neglect, oppose, or abuse it, must die in their sins and perish without remedy.—As the Lord has so amply provided in Christ Jesus all the rich variety of spiritual blessings, which can conduce to our comfort and holiness; and as those blessings lose no part of their beauty or excellency by the succession of ages: so Christians also should study to be useful and fruitful, the lights of the world and the healing of the people; that their whole conduct, and all their endeavours, may conduce to render men wiser, holier, and happier, on every side of them. They should bring forth fruit suited to the seasons of adversity and prosperity, and to the various occasions and circumstances in which they are called to act: they should consider it their duty and their privilege to have their leaf unwithering and their fruit increasing: because they are watered from the sanctuary of God: and they should delight in proceeding with increasing zeal and usefulness to serve him to the end of their lives. Surely none should deem themselves “branches of the living Vine,” who do not in some measure bring forth such fruits as he did, when he went about doing good to the souls and bodies of men! And if all that bear the name of Christians and profess the doctrine of Christ, were of this character, his religion would appear to be most excellent and beneficial in the eyes of all beholders. Such Christians need not doubt of their inheriting the good land, which Canaan typified, and which the Lord has sworn to give to the seed of Abraham: all the Gentiles, who believe in Christ, and are united to him by the supply of his sanctifying Spirit, are the children of Abraham and heirs according to promise, and will share the privileges of Israelites, without marring their inheritance: for there is room in the church and in heaven for all, who come for the blessings of that new covenant, of which Christ is the Surety and Mediator.

NOTES.

CHAP. XLVIII. V. 1—7. This division of the land entirely differs from that which was made in the days of Joshua; and it is not probable that it should ever literally take place: but it seems to denote the equality of privilege, which subsists among all the tribes of the redeemed, whatever their previous characters have been; and their intimate union and communion with each other.—“This division of the land among the twelve tribes may imply, that all true Christians shall be equally sharers in the privileges of the gospel.” Lowth. A portion is laid out for each tribe, directly across the country from east to west: and Reuben’s lot is placed between Ephraim and Judah. V. 30—35. It is most obvious to interpret these “measures,” of the reed which the prophet’s conductor held in his hand: for what was the use of it, but to measure with? Or what measure should we compute by, but that which the Spirit of God has pointed out to us? By this measure the city would be near forty miles in circuit, or ten miles on each side of the square; which was vastly larger than Jerusalem ever was. Doubtless the large dimensions of the city and land were intended to intimate the great increase of religion, and the propagation of the gospel in the times predicted. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xlv. 1—8. Is. xxvi. 1, 2. liv. 2, 3. lx. 15—22, v. 18. Rev. xxi. 9—21, vv. 12, 13. 16. 21.) ‘The same description is given of the gates of the new Jerusalem, (Rev. xxi. 12, 13,) to signify that all true Israelites have their share in this heavenly city, and a right to enter into it. (Rev. xxii. 14.)’ Lowth.—Levi. (31) One gate is here assigned to Levi; and only one to Joseph, or the two tribes descended from him.—The land here divided is never called Canaan, nor the city measured, Jerusalem; probably because they were figurative of spiritual blessings to the church and to Israel: but “the LORD is there,” or, “JEHOVAH-shammah,” (marg.) is the name given to this holy city: signifying that his powerful and gracious presence with his church is the source of all her peace, security, felicity, and holiness; and that at length these blessings will be abundantly communicated, and his presence and glory signally displayed among his people. (Marg. Ref. o.—Marg. and Ref.—Notes, Matt. xviii. 19, 20. xxviii. 19, 20, v. 20. John xiv. 18—24. Rev. xxi. 22—27. xxii. 2—5.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

When true converts enter the church by faith in Jesus Christ, all their former sins are blotted out, every stigma is removed, all distinctions are swallowed up, and the vilest of them are admitted to a full participation of all the privileges of the children of God, and made heirs according to the hope of eternal life. Yet on earth some of them must be placed more advantageously than others for their spiritual improvement: and in proportion to their degrees of grace and fruitfulness on earth, so will be their capacity for the glory and felicity of heaven, and their enjoyment of it.—Our inheritance, as the spiritual priests of the living God, cannot be forfeited or exchanged: nor should we desire to change the temporal portion, which our gracious Lord has allotted us. Especially it behoves the ministers of Christ to be contented in their places, and with “such things as they have:” and, as they must by no means waste or alienate the revenues appropriated to the maintenance of religion; so the Lord will call those to a strict account, who plunder them, or make the concerns of religion to subserve their love of filthy lucre.—In the visible church on earth, there will still be some part “profane;” even believers must spend part of their time in those employments, which do not immediately belong to religion; and though these must be performed from pious motives and in a conscientious manner, yet they should be kept distinct from spiritual concerns.—All that belong to the Israel of God should serve the common cause, in their proper places, and according to their abilities: and those who occupy themselves in so good a work, should not be left destitute of such things as are needful for them.—The way of access into the church is open on every side, that sinners may enter by faith, from all the quarters of the globe, and from all the tribes of the earth: and all that belong to the true church below, shall at last find admission into the holy city above: for all things are so regulated and established by the power, truth, and love of God, that no believer shall ever be ashamed of his confidence.—Through the whole extent of the church, even when it shall fill the earth, the Lord will vouchsafe his gracious presence and blessing. May we be found citizens of this holy city, and act consistently with that character; and have the benefit and comfort of the Lord's presence with us, in life, in death, and for evermore.

THE writer of this book was contemporary with Ezekiel, but probably younger than he : yet he began to prophesy before him ; and he continued in his prophetic office much longer. He was of the royal family of Judah ; and having been early in life carried captive to Babylon, he soon became renowned for wisdom, and was advanced to great authority under Nebuchadnezzar : and he seems to have continued in an exalted station, and in offices of great trust and power, through all the subsequent period of the Chaldean monarchy ; and afterwards under Darius the Mede and Cyrus the Persian : yet he was even then far more eminent for wisdom and piety, than for rank and authority. (Notes, i. 3—7. Ez. xiv. 13—21, vv. 14. 20. xxviii. 2—5, v. 3.) Josephus, no doubt speaking the current opinion of his countrymen at that time, calls Daniel ‘one of the greatest of the prophets ; for he was wont not only to foretel future things, as other prophets also did ; but he likewise determined the time when they should come to pass.’ But since his time, ‘the Jews, in order to invalidate the evidence, that results from the prophet’s writings in support of Christianity, have, on the authority of a few doctors, agreed to class him among the Hagiographi ; which decision, however, does not, upon their own rules, affect his pretensions to be considered as an inspired writer.’ Gray’s Key.—It may further be noted, that this determination, and the frivolous reasons assigned for it, are strong proofs, that his prophecy of seventy weeks has created them exceedingly great difficulties ; because it so fixes the time of the Messiah’s advent, that, unless Jesus of Nazareth be He, all expectations of his coming must be finally disappointed, if Daniel was indeed a prophet in the highest sense of the word. (Notes, ix. 24—27.)—Our Lord, however, called him “Daniel the prophet,” with a special recommendation of his predictions, even the most difficult of them, to the attention of his disciples. (Comp. viii. 13. ix. 27. xi. 31. xii. 11, with Matt. xxiv. 15. Mark xiii. 14.) And there is such a coincidence between his prophecies and those of St John, ‘that the latter, in his Revelation, doth more distinctly unfold those events, which the former foretels in general terms.’ Mede.—‘In his work hath been produced such instances of his having been a prophet, as an infidel cannot deny, or, if he denies, cannot disprove.’ Bp. Newton.—‘The first six chapters are chiefly historical, though indeed the second chapter contains the prophetic interpretation of Nebuchadnezzar’s dream, concerning the kingdoms which were successively to illustrate the power of God, who removeth and setteth up kings as seemeth good to him. ... The four historical chapters which succeed, relate the miraculous deliverance of Daniel’s companions from the furnace ; the remarkable punishment of Nebuchadnezzar’s arrogance ; the impiety and portended fate of Belshazzar ; and the divine interposition for the protection of Daniel in the lions’ den. All these are written with a spirit and animation highly interesting. We seem to be present at the scenes described ; and the whole is enriched with the most exalted sentiments of piety, and with the finest attestations to the praise and glory of God.’ Gray’s Key.—The last six chapters are entirely prophetic ; and a great part of them has generally been considered as extremely obscure. But it is the nature of prophecies not to be thoroughly understood, till they are thoroughly fulfilled. Not that such prophecies are therefore like the pagan oracles, of an ambiguous, equivocal, and delusive nature. Obscure they may be : but there is a wide difference between obscurity and equivocation. The pagan oracles were purposely worded in such a manner, that if they failed in one sense, they might hold good in another, though directly the contrary : the scripture-prophecies have a determined meaning ; and though sometimes they may comprehend more events than one, yet they are never applicable to contrary events. The pagan oracles were delivered for the immediate direction of those who consulted them ; and therefore a mistake at first was of more fatal consequence : the scripture-prophecies were intended more for the instruction ... of future ages ; and therefore it is sufficient if time shall illustrate the particulars. The pagan oracles are no sooner understood, than they are despised : ... the reverse is true of the scripture-prophecies : and the better you understand, the more you will admire them. The completion of the former demonstrates their fraud and futility, the completion of the latter, their truth and divinity.’ Bp. Newton.—Some parts, however, of these predictions are so exceedingly plain, and have been so exactly and circumstantially fulfilled, that Porphyry, a bitter enemy of Christianity, took occasion from this circumstance, to maintain that they were written after the predicted events. This is a most important testimony : for it shews, that the completion of those parts, which relate to historical facts ; terminating in the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes, was absolutely undeniable : yet it is capable of clear proof, that these prophecies were extant, in the Greek language, many years before Antiochus was born: and in the hands of the Egyptians, who had no kindness either to the Jews, or their religion.

But in fact, the prophecies of Daniel have in all succeeding generations received as undeniable accomplishments, as those did which relate to more ancient events. They all take their beginning from about the prophet's days: they all give a concise prophetic history of the church, and of the world, as far as immediately connected with it, nearly to the end of time: for even the prophecy of the seventy weeks, though the first coming of the Messiah is the most prominent subject, shews the state of the Jewish nation to this day, and intimates events which have not yet taken place. They all, either expressly, or by consequence, predict four great monarchies; the fourth of which shall last "to the time of the end," "the end of the indignation." They all foretel long continued calamities to the Jewish nation, and to the people of God; at length terminating in the restoration of Israel, and the final and universal triumph of true religion; the kingdom of Christ and of his saints, which must endure to the general resurrection. They are not insulated predictions: they all exhibit the same grand outlines of the plan of Providence, to the period of the church's calamities, varied in such a manner, as to reflect reciprocal light on each other. And for above two thousand years, the most prominent parts of history form the best interpretation of these astonishing prophecies.—These four kingdoms have succeeded each other: they have answered the description given of them with surprising exactness. The Messiah came at the appointed period, and was cut off; "the abomination of desolation" was set up in the holy place; Jerusalem was destroyed; the poor remnant of the Jews were scattered, and remain so to this day. The fourth kingdom, which thus desolated them, and persecuted the infant Christian church, after a time appearing in another form, has exactly answered the predictions of its blasphemy, tyranny, idolatry, and long continued dominion, given in this ancient book: and nothing now remains, but the destruction of this kingdom, the conversion of the Jews, and the final triumphs of true religion, to render the whole history of all those ages a clear comment on Daniel's prophecies.*—One great cause of the uncertainty, which numbers complain of as to the real meaning of these predictions, arises from learned and ingenious men trying to accommodate the events of their own time, (important indeed to them, but small in the grand concerns of the world, during revolving thousands of years,) to some detached particulars in the prophecy. But it should be remembered, that prophecy is a very small, though exact map; on which, not every county-town or considerable place is found, but merely those of pre-eminent consequence. No city, so to speak, is marked in Britain but London. It should, however, be also understood, that any interpretation, which violates the geography or chronology of prophecy, must be "a private interpretation," and not the real meaning. (Note, 2 Pet. i. 20, 21.) The grand outlines alone are marked, and those in their due order and arrangement. It is also of great importance to note, that many of the prophets, perhaps all in some measure, agree in the grand events predicted: the coming of a Saviour, to be the Light of the world, a great High Priest, and a glorious King; "His sufferings, and the glory which would follow;" the present state of the Jews, the corruption and persecutions of the church by a powerful and blasphemous enemy; the final restoration of Israel; and the victories, triumphs, and kingdom of the Redeemer. Some give one view of these subjects, and some another: but all agree in the general outlines; the prophets uniformly confirm each other's testimony; and in no one instance is there a discordant voice, or any thing that can be thought so, by those who diligently examine and compare the whole. This combination of testimony gives prophecy its full force; and, connected with its accomplishment, amounts to a complete moral demonstration, that the scriptures are the oracles of God.

'The prophecy is writ, part in Hebrew, part in Chaldee: for which this reason may be assigned; that those parts of it, in which the Babylonian empire was concerned, were writ in their language, viz. from ii. 4, to the end of the seventh chapter; a great part of which was probably entered into their public registers.' Lowth.

From the consideration, that this eminent and greatly beloved servant of God was, to extreme old age, and probably till his death, a minister of state in a heathen court, we may conclude with observing, that faith and piety are not confined to any place or station in life, but that the Lord can preserve his people humble and spiritual in the midst of all possible snares, and in the most entangling employments, to which his providence calls them.

* The rise and surprising progress of the Mohammedan delusion seem also clearly predicted, under the emblem of the "little horn of the third beast." (Notes, viii. 9—12. 22—26.)

CHAP. I.

Jehoiakim, with part of the sacred vessels, is carried captive, 1, 2. Nebuchadnezzar commits Daniel, and certain young Jews, to the master of the eunuchs, to be instructed in the Chaldee learning; allotting them a daily portion, and changing their names, 3—7. They refuse to eat of the king's meat; and, being permitted to live on pulse and water, they improve in vigour and comeliness, 8—16. God confers on them knowledge and wisdom; so that, being far superior to the wise men of Babylon, they are preferred by the king, 17—21.

IN the ^a third year of the reign of Jehoiakim king of Judah, came Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon unto Jerusalem, and besieged it.

2 And ^b the Lord gave Jehoiakim king of Judah into his hand, ^c with part of the vessels of the house of God, which he carried into the land of ^d Shinar to the house of his god; ^e and he brought the vessels into the treasure-house of his god.

3 And the king spake unto Ashpenaz, the master of his eunuchs, that he should bring ^f certain of the children of Israel, and of the king's seed, and of the princes;

4 Children ^g in whom was no blemish, but well favoured, ^h and skilful in all wisdom, and cunning in knowledge, and understanding science, and such as had ⁱ ability in them to stand in the king's palace, and whom they might teach the learning and the tongue of the Chaldeans.

5 And the king appointed them ^k a daily provision of the king's meat, and of the wine ^{*} which he drank: so nourishing them three years, that at the end thereof they might ^l stand before the king.

6 Now among these were, of the children of Judah, ^m Daniel, Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah:

7 Unto whom ⁿ the prince of the eunuchs ^o gave names: for he gave unto Daniel the name of Belteshazzar; and to ^p Hananiah, of Shadrach; and to Mishael, of Meshach; and to Azariah, of Abed-nego.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1, 2. (Marg. Ref. a.—Notes, 2 Kings xxiv. 1, 2. Ezra i. 1—4. Jer. xxv. 1.) This may be considered as the first date of the beginning of the seventy years' captivity: for it has been shewn, that there were several.—'At this time Jehoiakim became tributary to the king of Babylon; and consequently the seventy years of captivity and vassalage to Babylon began.' Lowth.—'He carried the sacred vessels to the temple of his God: not so much for the ordinary use of his priests, as to be laid up for monuments in the treasure-house that pertained to his idol, ... even Bel, the god of the Babylonians, &c.' Bp. Hall. (Marg. Ref. c—e.—Note, v. 1—4.)—The Lord gave. (2) Marg. Ref. b.

V. 3—7. It is evident, that Daniel and his companions were carried captive, when Jehoiakim fell into the hands of Nebuchadnezzar, though it is not here mentioned, and before the captivity of Jehoiachin.—The eastern monarchs have in every age been accustomed to employ eunuchs, in their palaces and about their persons: and as these were frequently advanced to the highest dignities; the original word is sometimes used in general for a courtier, or officer in the palace. It is probable, however, that Daniel and his companions were eunuchs.—'The master of the eunuchs,' on this occasion, received orders from Nebuchadnezzar, to select from the young men of Israel, and especially from those of royal and noble birth, such as were unblemished in their outward form, and of comely figure, who had good capacities, and had received the rudiments of a good education; and whose prudence, good sense, and learning might render them fit to occupy some station at court. It was then, as well as at present, deemed a branch of magnificence to be served by foreigners: perhaps the king had observed several of the young Jews to be very ingenious, and of promising abilities; and he desired to avail himself of the talents both of his native subjects, and of those whom he had acquired by conquest. These young men were to be instructed in the learning and language of the Chaldeans, and in every science which could qualify them for service. Three years were allotted for their education: and to encourage them to be diligent and obsequious, they were to be supplied with viands and wine, every day, from the king's own table. This education would tend, and probably was meant, to detach them from the interests of their people and religion, and to attach them to those of their new masters.—Among the number selected, there were four more distinguished and conscientious than the rest: their names were all compounded with the original words for God, or Lord: "Daniel" signifying God my Judge; "Hananiah," the grace of the Lord; and "Azariah," the Lord is a help. It is not agreed what "Mishael" signifies, but it is compounded with El, the name of God.—'The master of the eunuchs,' however, changed these names for others compounded with the names of the idols of Babylon; as intimating the change which he expected or desired in their religion. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, iv. 8, 9, v. 8. Gen. xli. 45, 46.)—The word rendered "children" is frequently used for young persons, when come to maturity: and it is the common opinion, that Daniel was at this time twenty years of age. Indeed we must suppose,

8 ¶ But Daniel ^a purposed in his heart, that he would not ^r defile himself with the portion of the king's meat, nor with the wine which he drank; therefore he requested of the prince of the eunuchs that he might not defile himself.

9 Now ^s God had brought Daniel into favour and tender love with the prince of the eunuchs.

10 And the prince of the eunuchs said unto Daniel, ^t "I fear my lord the king, who hath appointed your meat and your drink: for why should he see your faces ^{*} worse liking than the children which are of your [†] sort? then shall ye make me endanger my head to the king.

11 Then said Daniel to [†] Melzar, whom the prince of the eunuchs had set over Daniel, Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah,

12 Prove thy servants, I beseech thee, ten days: and let them give us ^v pulse to eat, and water to drink.

13 Then let our countenances be looked upon before thee, and the countenance of the children that eat of the portion of the king's meat: and as thou seest, deal with thy servants.

16 Thus ^v Melzar took away the portion of their meat, and the wine that they should drink; and gave them pulse.

from the narrative, that both he and his companions were at least seventeen or eighteen.—As these young men were of the seed-royal, it is probable that some of them were descended from Hezekiah: and thus the prophecy, concerning his posterity, was exactly fulfilled. (Note, 2 Kings xx. 17, 18.)

V. 8—16. It is probable, that Daniel first formed his own determination, and then brought over his companions to his views and purpose. (Marg. Ref. q.) He did not consider it as unlawful to learn the sciences and language of the Chaldeans, as a preparation for future usefulness: and we may hence decidedly conclude, that he was not required to study the arts of the magicians and astrologers. He resolved, however, "not to defile himself with the "portion of the king's meat."—Many of the dishes would consist, in part at least, of those meats which were unclean according to the law; others of them would be such as had been offered to idols; and the wine, it is probable, had been presented to them, and a part from it poured out for a libation on their altars. Daniel, no doubt, concluded that by eating and drinking of these provisions he should have fellowship with idolaters; (Marg. Ref. r.—Note, 1 Cor. x. 18—22;) or be corrupted with the prevailing luxury and intemperance of the court, as well as induced to eat such meats as the law of God forbade: and that such a self-indulgent course of life was suited neither to the afflicted state of his country, nor to his own condition as a captive, nor to his character as a devoted worshipper of the God of Israel. He was therefore resolved not to defile himself: yet he did not rudely refuse what was intended in kindness; but gently and modestly requested the prince, or master, of the eunuchs, to indulge him in this respect, as his conscience was concerned in it. It is, however, improbable, that he would have succeeded quietly in his purpose; had not that God, whom he so conscientiously served, given him a place in the esteem and tender compassionate regard of this stranger; by means of the excellent abilities, discretion, courteousness, and amiable qualities, with which God had endued him. (Marg. Ref. s.—Notes, Gen. xxxii. 27, 28. xxxix. 2—6. Prov. xvi. 7.) The prince of the eunuchs, therefore, was disposed to gratify Daniel: but he feared lest the king, who had given orders about the diet of the young Jews, should observe any of them to look unhealthy and dejected, as he took it for granted they would, if they lived on pulse and water: so that, comparing their countenances with those who were not so scrupulous, he should enquire into the cause of the difference; and, finding that his orders had been disobeyed, should in a rage order him to be put to death. (Marg. and Ref.) The subsequent history shews that he had some ground, from the character of the king, for these apprehensions. It seems, however, that he was willing to connive at the desired change, though he would not order it; and perhaps he hinted to Daniel, that Melzar, his deputy, could do it with less danger: at least Daniel applied to him, and besought that a trial might be made for the space of ten days; during which time he and his friends would live upon pulse, or vegetables, and water, without any kind of animal food or wine: and if on this spare diet, they did not thrive as well, as those who ate the king's portion, he might afterwards refuse his concurrence. This temperate diet would be in its own nature wholesome; yet it was not suited to render them fatter in flesh than the others: but doubtless Daniel's confidence was placed on the special blessing of God, to render it so nourishing, that he and his friends might no more be tempted to defile themselves. It cannot, however, be supposed, that he would in any case have consented to eat forbidden food, whatever sufferings his refusal might have exposed them to. But the Lord did not disappoint his expectation; for his looks and those of his friends fully satisfied Melzar, that he might safely leave them to their own plan; and so he took away, perhaps as a perquisite to himself, the portion which was allotted them from the king's table.—This was a singular instance of conscientious temperance and self-denial in young persons, who had

V. 17—21. It pleased God so to prosper the instructions given to Daniel and his friends, and their application to study; and so to communicate knowledge and wisdom from himself, that they far excelled their fellow students in every thing: (*Marg. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. z.—Notes, ii. 17—23. Gen. xl. 8.) So that, when they were brought before the king, (who appears to have been a man of learning and penetration,) they were found far better qualified for his service than any of the other students: nay, they far excelled in learning, and in the satisfactory solution of difficult questions, all the magicians and astrologers, and other pretenders to extraordinary discoveries, with which his realm abounded. They were therefore speedily advanced to honourable stations in his palace: and Daniel continued to be employed in the affairs of government, and to be regarded as a prophet, through the whole remaining duration of the Chaldean monarchy; and till Cyrus succeeded to the kingdom, on the death of his father-in-law, Darius the Mede. Thus he lived to witness the conclusion of the seventy years, which Jeremiah had predicted as the term of the captivity: (Note, ix. 2, 3:) and there can be no reasonable doubt, that Cyrus's favourable decree was procured by his means. Indeed it is evident that he survived that event at least two or three years. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. a—e.—x. 1. Note, Ezra i. 1—4.)

(17) ‘They were particularly skilful, in those parts of the Chaldean learning, which was really useful, and might recommend them to the favour of the kings both of Babylon and Persia, and qualify them for places of trust under them.—So Moses’s education in Egyptian learning (Acts vii. 22) fitted him to be a ruler of God’s people.’ Lowth. (Note, Ex. ii. 10.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

The successes of ungodly men, even in their enterprizes against the worshippers of God, are to be ascribed to his interposition: they could “have no power against them, except it were given them from above;” though they generally either take the glory of it to themselves, or give it to their idols.—The Lord will permit his enemies to profane even those things, which have been consecrated to his service, when they have been polluted by the hypocrisy or crimes of his professed worshippers.—It is the prudence of princes to employ the abilities and endowments, of body or mind, and all qualifications natural or acquired, which are to be found among every class of their subjects: and it is the wisdom of God thus to bring forth into scenes of usefulness, those whom he has qualified to serve the publick, or his church. He will sometimes have a few of his servants to stand in king’s palaces, to direct the deliberations of senates, or to sway the affairs of kingdoms; as well as others to be employed in the work of the ministry, or in the obscure occupations of private life. We should therefore consider seriously what is our proper work, and do it diligently; and not censure others who aim to glorify God in a different sphere.—Youth is the time for acquiring useful knowledge: nor is it superfluous for those, who most simply seek wisdom from God, to apply their minds, and to employ their time, in pursuing various kinds of human learning.—Kings, who would have able statesmen and servants, should encourage literature, and support men of abilities in prosecuting their studies; for they will find but few disposed to such pursuits, except they have a prospect of being comfortably supported, nay, liberally rewarded. How careful then should parents be, so to train up their children, that they may be qualified for future usefulness! But alas! the education which is generally patronized, by royal or publick bounty, tends more to corrupt men’s principles and morals, than to improve them; and to lead them, from scriptural sentiments, language, and behaviour, to adopt the names, notions, habits, and phraseology of heathens: and, instead of teaching youth to bridle their passions, and to exercise self-denial, it too commonly initiates them in luxury, or confirms them in habits of licentiousness.

V. 8—20.

If the Lord has put it into the heart of any young person, from pure principles, to “purpose not to defile himself,” by any unlawful or inexpedient indulgence; he will enable him to obtain the benefit, and to escape the dangers, of every situation. But this will require much command over every appetite and natural inclination: and much firmness, meekness, and prudence will also be requisite, to avoid giving needless offence: for, even where conscience and duty are concerned, modest persuasion and intreaty are preferable to impetuosity, moroseness, and obstinacy.—When the Lord sees good, he can bring his servants “into favour and tender love,” even with strangers to true religion: and indeed the genuine spirit of Christianity, when connected with the meekness of wisdom and superior abilities, is exceedingly amiable and conciliating even in the eyes of ungodly men, where it does not interfere with their pride, lusts, and interests.—Those who first form salutary designs, will seldom be left alone in them; though few in general will concur, compared with the numbers who prefer present indulgence or interest to duty.—Temperance, nay, abstinence, is more consistent with health, than men are apt to believe, who seek excuses for self-indulgence. Yet there may be seasons, when a degree of abstemiousness is needful, which in other circumstances would not be proper. If this be undertaken by any man, in the fear of God, and not from pharisaical pride or affectation, or with a spirit of censoriousness; but either that he may not defile himself by an improper intercourse with ungodly men, or that he may “keep under his body and bring it into subjection:” he may expect a peculiar blessing on his spare diet, to support his health, and to fit him for active service; without burdening his conscience, or “making provision for the flesh to fulfil the lusts thereof.” And though a regard to health is a general duty, there may be cases, when the care “of keeping a conscience void of offence” will render even this a subordinate consideration; which may in a measure be overlooked, upon the same principle, that the offending right hand must be cut off, and that the martyr yields up his life rather than sin against God. When any see it necessary to purpose such designs in their hearts, and to mention them even to those, who have a tender love for them; they will often find them a hindrance to their designs, out of fear, either respecting them, or on their own account. When, however, the trial is made, such fears are often found to have been mere temptations: and conscientious temperance will always be found more beneficial, even to the comfort of this present life, than sinful indulgence. It also exceedingly tends to fit a man for study, or any great and continued mental exertions: and pious young men should endeavour to excel their fellows in every useful pursuit; not that they may be praised, but for the honour of the Gospel, and that they may be qualified for usefulness.—For whatever station or service the Lord intends men, he will give them suitable endowments: and the wisdom which he bestows, is ten thousand times better than worldly policy, curious arts, or the most admired attainments of human learning; both for the management of secular concerns, and with respect to the eternal world.—It is a happiness to the realm, and an honour to the prince, when he is competent to judge who are best qualified to serve him, and when he expressly prefers them on that account.—A youth spent in temperance and piety, and in departing from evil, conduces to durable usefulness and eminence; and treasures up joys for the future, either on earth, or in heaven, or both. Let then young men keep their eyes steadily fixed on the examples of this chapter: let us all “count every thing but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ,” and the experience of his salvation; and always remember, that God will “honour those that honour him, but that they who despise him shall be lightly esteemed.”

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1. Nebuchadnezzar was king of Babylon, when he came up to Jerusalem, and carried away Daniel and his friends to Babylon; which was in the first year of his reign: yet after Daniel had been three years educating, Nebuchadnezzar is said to have had this dream in the second year of his reign (1). Hence it is concluded that he reigned some time along with his Father: and that this was in the second year of his reigning alone. (Note, Jer. xxv. 1.) The king was convinced that his dream was supernatural, and was troubled about it, though he could not recollect particulars: God so ordering it, that he might bring Daniel forth into notice, to make known his own glory, as the God of Israel and of the whole earth. (Marg. Ref.)

(Note, 44, 45.)

V. 2. ‘Daniel and his companions did not appear among them; perhaps because the Chaldeans despised them as youths and strangers, and would not have them thought equal in knowledge with themselves.’ Lowth.—Sorcerers.] ‘This word is always taken in an ill sense by the holy writers, for those who consult evil spirits.’ Ibid.—The Chaldeans.] ‘The Chaldeans were so much addicted to the study of the heavenly motions, and to make prognostications from thence; that the word Chaldean is used, both in Greek and Latin writers, for an astrologer.’ Ibid. (*Marg. 3 And the king said unto them, ° I have dreamed a dream, and my spirit was troubled to know the dream.

4 Then spake the Chaldeans to the king ^fin Syriack, ^gO king, live for ever: ^htell thy servants the dream, and we will shew the interpretation.

5 The king answered and said to the Chaldeans, The thing is gone from me: if ye will not make known unto me the dream, with the interpretation thereof, ye ⁱ shall be *cut in pieces, and your houses shall be ^kmade a dunghill.

6 But if ye shew the dream, and the interpretation thereof, ^lye shall receive of me gifts and [†]rewards and great honour: therefore shew me the dream, and the interpretation thereof.

7 They answered again, and said, ^mLet the king tell his servants the dream, and we will shew the interpretation of it.

8 And the king answered and said,

9 But if ye will not make known unto me the dream, ⁿthere is but one decree for you: ° for ye have prepared lying and corrupt words to speak before me, till ^pthe time be changed: therefore tell me the dream, and I shall know that ye can shew me the interpretation thereof.

10 The Chaldeans answered before the king, and said, There is not a man upon the earth that can shew the king's matter: therefore there is no king, lord, nor ruler, that asked such things at any magician, or astrologer, or Chaldean.

13 And ^tthe decree went forth that when further advanced in years and established in reputation, along with the astrologers and Chaldeans; this shews that their learning was of another kind, and was known to be so. (Notes, i. 8—16. 17—20, vv. 17. 20. v. 10—12.)
